In this country there appears to be no present indication of disturbance, unless disturbance should result from the over-zeal of those who are desirous to support the government. Adhesions from various associations were pouring in upon the authorities, with promises of aid in the persons of "brave and effective men."

Some of the more violent, it seems, had recommended that arms should be distributed among the supporters of Government, that they might be timely prepared to quell any outbreak, or overawe the disaffected. This, however, the Earl of Clarendon had discountenanced, by which judicious policy a counter-demonstration had no doubt been avoided.

Troops were concentrated in the most turbulent portions of the country. In Cork there were about 2000, and in Dublin an armed force, including the police, of 10,000.

A prospectus of a Protestant Repeal Association had been issued, having the following for its principles:

1st. The suppression of all religious differences, and the union of the Protestant middle classes in Ireland, for legislative independence. 2d. The exercise of public opinion as the sole means to effectuate their object. And 3d. Loyalty to the Queen, defence of the rights of property as they exist at present, with the repudiation of all republican principles.

Sir Charles Napier had attended a meeting at Conciliation Hall, but without any farther participation in it than appearing upon the platform.

The news from America had caused great excitement, and addresses to the repealers in the United States were talked of. The merchants of of Belfast, on the other hand, had signed a requisition to the mayor requesting him to call a meeting for the following objects:

1st. To declare the public abhorrence of the wicked and rebellious spirit, so boldly manifested in the capital and certain parts of the south of Ireland; and, at the same time, express confidence in the wisdom, energy, and power of the executive, to suppress the seditious movement now in progress. 2nd. To express our unabated attachment to the throne of these realms and the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland. 3rd. To offer our services to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, in any way which may tend to uphold order and promote peace and good-will among all classes of her Majesty's subjects.

The "gentry, merchants and citizens" of Dublin, in public meeting convened, had passed resolutions requesting the Mayor to put in force the special constables' act rather than allow societies to arm for the security of the public peace.

The Bishop of Kerry, the Right Rev. Dr. Egan has addressed a circular to the clergy of his diocese, earnestly urging on them the necessity of maintaining peace and order in their respective parishes. The Bishops of Cork and Cloyne are about to issue similar messengers of peace and good-will.

Destitution in the West and South.—There are melancholy details of the sufferings of the poor in the papers received from Mayo, Galway and Limerick this day. Several deaths from actual starvation are reported, while deaths from diseases, superinduced by unwholesome and insufficient food, are of constant occurrence. The poor-houses in some parts are represented to be mere charnel houses, full of disease, and deaths constantly occurring.

Poor people requiring relief are, according to the rules, obliged to enter those frightful buildings where they are tolerably sure of taking the fever which rages in them. Those discharged carry the infection with them, and so pollute whole districts. The following particulars are really revolting. The Mayo Constitution, let it be observed, is a moderate Conservative journal, and here is its picture of the poor of that country.

"The poor are dying in hundreds—the dead are huddled into shallow pits, unshrouded and uncoffined—the diseased are allowed to die without an effort being made to heal their maladies—and thousands of famishing wretches are sinking into the arms of death from absolute starvation."

Plunder of Food.—Such being the state of the poor in the county of Mayo, it is not to be wondered at that the plunder of food has again become a general offence. Sheep and lambs are killed and the flesh carried away. The Constitution gives the following:

On the 1st inst., three carts laden with meal from Dalina to Foxford, were attacked at a village called Onloge, by about 100 persons, principally women, and having assaulted the carriers, they succeeded in carrying off the entire of the loads, amounting to three tons weight.

On the 3d inst., seven carts with Indian meal for the relief of the poor, proceeding from Swinford to a very distressed district on the borders of the county Sligo, were attacked by about forty men and women, and having succeeded in cutting the bags, carried off about 7 cwt. of the meal. None of the parties have been arrested.

The Savings Banks.—The people have been extensively acting upon the foolish recommendation to withdraw their deposits from the savings banks. On Monday week, in Dublin, large sums were withdrawn, and on Monday last £11,000 were removed by small depositors.

The provincial jouanals intimate that similar demands on the savings banks in the south and west of Ireland are made. A circumstance has just occurred in Tralee which will probably have some effect in stimulating this folly of the people. The secretary of the Tralee savings bank, after 25 years acting in that capacity, has been found a defaulter. The depositors will not lose, but the circumstance will shake public confidence in such a time of excitement.

One of the London papers, speaking of Ireland, under date of the 15th, says:

The Repeal movement has reached a crisis which, it must be confessed, it has never hitherto attained. The present posture of affairs in that country is the most complicated and perilous, and no lengthened period can elapse before the English Government and the majority of the Irish people will have joined issue on the subject of Repeal.

The news from Ireland, today, (April 15,) is more unfavorable for the Government. The disaffection in the army is still on the increase, and the Repeal journals more violent than ever.

CANAL NAVIGATION.—Notwithstanding the opening of the canal, it can hardly be said that navigation has commenced. There is not yet sufficient water to float a loaded boat, and probably will not be before this evening or tomorrow morning. Up to 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, 45 light boats had been cleared west and south, but no loaded ones.

A boat came down the Valley Canal yesterday, with some few hundred bushels of wheat, and another with 500 barrels of flour. The canal in the region of the city is thronged with boats, waiting for water.—Roch. Amer. of yesterday.

DEATH FROM THE BITE OF A CAT.—A youth named Keeler, lately died in New York, raving mad, from the effects of a bite. The boy was bitten some six months ago by a cat, supposed at the time to be rabid, but no evil effects were observed at the time, or since, until a few hours before his death, when the symptoms of hydrophobia became apparent and assumed a most violent and distressing form.

Sonnet.

Wake, sleeping bard! too long bedimming rust
Hath rested on the chords of thy rich shell!
Awake! arouse, and people mount and dell
With deathless beings of the mind!—from dust
The gifted men of olden time call up;
And speak to them when Night is on her throne;
Oh! raise the gilded and enchanted cup
Of Romance to thy thirsting lip, and drink!
And in the chain of inspiration be
A dazzling, proud, imperishable link.
Let thy rapt muse, emerging from thick gloom,
Like Venus rising from the misty sea,
Quaff joy from winds that fan bright isles of endless bloom

Limitations to the Right of Suffrage.

From a Lecture before the Young Men's Association of Buffalo.

BY S. WILKESON, JR.

I propose to fix in theory the limitation that should exist to the Right of Suffrage in the State of New York.

* * * * *

By the laws of the United States, an alien immigrant must have resided in the country for five years before he can be admitted to the rights of citizenship. The Constitution and the laws of the State of New York have limited the right of suffrage to male citizens of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been citizens for ten days and inhabitants of the State for one year next preceding any election, and for the last four months residents of the county where they may offer their votes—excepting firstly, men of color, who are not possessed of a real estate worth at least $250 over and above all their debts, and excepting, secondly, all men who may have been convicted of bribery, larceny, or any infamous crime, for which they shall not have received a pardon, and all persons who may have betted upon the results of any election, who are, thereby debarred from the right of voting at that election.

The limitation of the right of suffrage to voters who have attained twenty one years of age, is proper. The right evidently should begin at that period in life, when men ordinarily begin to do business upon their own responsibility. Some commence at the age of fifteen, and are at that time competent to manage Capital and Labor. Others are never competent to control a business which requires for its profitable pursuit, judgment and method. But as a general rule, in our climate and in our society, men at the age of twenty one, are fitted to undertake the duties of civil and social life. It is not material to decide whether the right of suffrage should begin sooner or later in life, or whether some should be entrusted with its exercise at an earlier day than others. It is important only to determine when it shall begin, and to fix the time, by a general rule that shall be applicable to all cases, and that shall rest in convenience. The rule as fixed by the New-York law, is a rule of convenience, based on reason.

But what shall be said of that other rule which declares that, however matured may be the intellect, or rich the experience of the citizen, if he happen to have been born and bred upon the Eastern shore of the Atlantic, instead of the Western, he cannot vote till he have lived five years in our midst, and during that time, have not only intended to become a citizen of the United States, but have actually declared his intention upon the records of a court of justice?

Our law calls the citizen of foreign birth an alien. Itself an alien, reared and matured in the East, and on Feudal soil—when received in the West and adopted, it was not strange that it should be found to incorporate the prejudice, that from the remotest antiquity has drawn a deep line of distinction between the stranger to the soil and the native. Alien!—an odious word that in our literature has got to be synonymous with outcast, and is oftenest employed there in hard and painful contrast to the sweet image of home, of affection, and of love—a word that in the Jewish polity, designated a stranger to the high privileges of Hebrew birth, and a stranger to the protection of Hebrew law—the victim of its disabilities and its prejudices—that in the laws of Greece and Rome, designated a barbarian—cruelly signified even to this day, by the term stranger, stranger in chivalrous and polished France, whose droit d'aubaine swept into the coffers of the king, the property of the foreigner who was so unfortunate as to die on his soil; a word denoting in the great body of the common law of England, a mere sojourner in the land, one necessarily hostile to its government, and not to be permitted to acquire a foothold on its soil; who can measure the influence of its echoes in the hearts of men inside and outside of our courts of justice, and halls of legislation, and as uttered by the great voice of the press?

During the entire history of the world, literature, law and politics, have conspired to efface the image of brotherhood that God has ever presented to man, as the symbol of his relations to his fellow man. Seas and rivers that he appointed to be the highways of intercourse between the members of a common family, have been made the boundaries and barriers of rival territory. Mountains designed benevolently in the economy of Nature have ever been lines of non intercourse and castellated fortifications of State jealousy and pride. It is amazing that the divine idea of community of relationship and of interest between the peoples of the earth, should have made so little progress in the last two thousand years. It is only when we apprehend the power of the confederation of pride, rapacity, cruelty, and ignorance, that has existed age after age, in all the old States of the world, as the teacher of political truths, that we know how its maxims have been severally transmitted to our day, each as of the true gospel of policy, and how they have defeated everywhere the recognition of the brotherhood of Nations.

Our laws salute the foreigner as he lands on our shore and call him alien. He has bade an eternal farewell to his native land. He has brought with him his household goods—his wife and his children are at his side. and with him are his plough and his reaping hook. He has sundered every political and social tie that bound him to his European home, and offers to our country, all that he has and all that he is—all that he loves and all that he hopes for, and asks to be admitted to the rights of citizenship. Our laws reply that he must first serve a five years apprenticeship to Democracy. And yet that man at the very instant he touches the soil with the intention of making it his home, is in every respect as completely a citizen as if he had been born and bred upon the soil.

Why not! What is the relation of Man to the soil? The whole earth is the theatre of human conduct. God gave it to man to weave his destiny in. To no part has he confined his life, Upon any circle of the globe's latitude may he live, and he may track the sun in his course, plying the loom of time as he goes. The domain of the earth is as free to the step of man, as the air is free to the wing of the bird: and the man whose migrations are restricted by any law except what is imposed upon him by the constitution of his nature, is restrained in his rights. The territory of the globe never was given by God to Governments. It was designed for individuals. Governments are not known in God's providence. They are not spiritual, and therefore are not accountable. The territorial soil is not owned by the government, whose force and spirit pervade its limits. The soil and actual territorial property is in the people, who in their collective form compose the State. The government is but the application of the rules by which their civil association is regulated. Any man may go out from the authority of these rules when he ceases to share the common faith in their wisdom and justice. If a man cannot be required to maintain his ideas unchanged, he cannot be required to submit himself forever to the control of the power which executes the political ideas of any number of associated individuals. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance is therefore false. Man is not a tree and never was planted by the Creator in any quarter of the great garden of life.

* * * * *

A State cannot rightfully make laws to regulate the intercourse of foreigners with its citizens, which the citizens themselves cannot make, each in their individual cases. Now suppose that an Englishman in the course of his travel had scaled the Chinese wall and penetrated the country within. He comes upon a cultivator gathering leaves from the tea plant. The Chinaman, with looks of amazement and disgust, orders the Englishmen to retrace his steps and quit the realm. The Englishman equally amazed, asks 'why?' Instead of replying that it his right to order him out, the Chinaman embodies that idea in telling the Englishman that he is a foreigner, and that for that reason he will hold no intercourse with him. "A foreigner!" says the Englishman—"true I am. But am I not a man as well as yourself!" "You are." "Am I infected with any contagious disease?" "You are not." "Do I look like a mischievous or a dangerous man?" "Your face betokens a just and manly character." "I am an artizan," says the Englishman—"I labor usefully. If you will interrogate me, you will learn that there is nothing in my character, my habits, or my sentiments from which you can apprehend the least danger to any of your rights or your interests. And now let me ask you a single question. Will my presence here displace you from any soil necessary to your well being, or abridge your means of developing your nature?" The Chinaman is compelled to answer, "No!" "Why then," says the Englishman, "do you order me out of your country—why have I not as perfect a right to be in it as you have?" The Chinaman falls back upon a law to maintain himself, and says that the policy of his government has for ages forbade intercourse with foreign nations—and that the Englishman has no right to be there, because it is against the law of the country. But the whole world have declared that the law was wrong—and this judgment whether consciously or unconsciously rests on this basis—that a government has no rights higher or wider than those of its citizens, and that it cannot establish a rule which an individual cannot establish, and require to have obeyed. If it be true that the whole surface of the earth was given by God to man, as a platform for his life and the fulfillment of his destiny, and that no one has an exclusive right to more soil than is essential to his well being—and if it be true that by the constitution of man's nature he is a gregarious being, designed for society and to be perfected only in society—and that he have a right to repel only such association as will expose his life or his property to destruction or injury, or will hurt his character, then the policy of non-intercourse, established by the Chinese Government, was wrong. And the entire civilized world think so, and tacitly justify the English in their violent disruption of the anti-social bands wound about that empire, and their hewing out what will in time, be an open pathway into the bosom of its territory, and the heart of its population. Though the Chinese were entitled to the sympathy due to a people struggling to avert from themselves the curse of a poison so destructive as opium, yet they did not receive it. Enlightened nations have found a deep satisfaction in the issue of the war waged by Great Britain—and in its results. Without stopping at the alleged cause of the war, the interruptions of the opium trade, and the losses sustained by the English who were engaged in it, and which they know to be frivolous, they go lower down and find a real justification for it in the right of any one power to compel another, to abandon a policy so opposed to the rights and interests of the human race as the prohibition of friendly intercourse.

It is undoubtedly the privilege of a State to regulate its intercourse with another so as to prevent the introduction of contagious disease among its citizens—to exclude from its limits, men who live by the commission of crimes, and whose migrations are only from one field of plunder to another, and to make itself independent of other countries, for the supply of all the products of the earth which its own soil and climate will produce, and to secure to its people the privilege of continuous labor, and of drawing for themselves from every department of art and of science, the means of elevating and adorning their lives. Quarantine laws, imigration laws, and tariffs, either for protection or revenue, are rightful in principle.

But when we have enumerated these restrictions upon the intercourse of people of different States, have we not named all that can be rightfully imposed? What title to exclusiveness can be made out?

* * * * *

Take the strongest claim that our own history furnishes us with. The PURITANS left their homes in Europe to find a place where they could worship God after their own hearts. They wrested the New England wilderness from the possession of savages and wild beasts, and subdued it to themselves. The State among the Puritans was a religious corporation. They planted a colony, and organized its government for the express purpose of enjoying their own religion in their own way. Now had they a right to banish the Quaker? Not to speak of their right to hang him for his heresy, had they to begin with, the right to forbid his being there at all? Certainly they had not. The only territory assigned to Creed is the soul. No portion of the earth is adapted to it Neither a State, nor a county, nor a township, nor an acre, were given to Puritanism. The globe was not constituted for, nor given to Calvinists, or Quakers, Jews or Turks, Christians or Infidels; but to MAN. If truth be the test of the right of a Creed to prevail, what stability can there possibly be in the jurisdiction of religions—nay how can their authority be settled by the test of Truth? Human belief is changeable—and as the elements of Faith are the same in all minds, each mans convictions are to himself absolute truth, and one creed of equal validity with another. To put this case of the Puritans in the strongest position—let us suppose that their Creed was true and essential to the soul, and that banishment of the Quakers was not a punishment, but an act of self-protection. As we have already said, the soul is the boundary of the empire of Faith. It has no geographical limits. Truth repels error and maintains itself. It is indestructible and eternal. Banishing error from its presence is not simply useless, but unphilosophic. How shall Truth spread, but by conquest of error, and how shall this conquest be made if they be not allowed to meet! But banishment of Quakers from out of a Puritan colony, was not simply an expulsion of heresy, but a driving out of a man with his physical wants and necessities all upon him, and his rights all within him. The right to banish from Connecticut is the right to banish from New Amsterdam—and the right to banish from New Amsterdam is the right to banish from the Jerseys—and if the Quaker was so unfortunate as to get upon a circle of States which all punished non-conformity with banishment, he might have been driven restless round the earth, and have found no home upon its surface. It is clear that the right to drive a man out of any particular portion of the world, is the to drive him out of the world entirely. For if he can be banished from one State for the same reason he can be banished from all States, including the state of existence. The right to banish stands upon the same basis as the right to kill—and I affirm that under no circumstances has a State authority to expel one of its citizens from its territory. It is his home, and his title to it comes from a source higher than the State. Residence is not a social right—but a natural right—and it never can be forfeited except by the consent of the citizen, for any crime or cause whatever. Political residence is as sacred as human life. God gave it, and the State cannot take it away. Is it not manifestly so? Life on the soil —residence that is, and in society, political residence—is just as necessary to the developement of character, as physical life itself is. The one cannot exist without the other.

Let no one lose the distinction between a religious society and a political society—each composed of men, professing a common faith. It is the same distinction that exists between a State and a convent. This is a human creation, and its builders and owners can manage it as they please. All the rights connected with it are artificial and not natural, and spring from the caprice of its proprietors. But the earth is not the property of States, nor of man. It is a condition of human existence, as is the atmosphere we breathe, and is common to all by a right as clear and as strong, as is the common right of the human race to air and light. Into the convent can come only such as are permitted to come. None have a right to be there but such as have an interest there. But into Italy the Protestant has a right to go and to stay. Catholic Italy has its title in literature, but not in nature. She is not Catholic —she is of no religion. Her people adhere to the church of Rome, but her soil has been pressed every where by the altars of the Latin, the Greek, and the Goth, and the statues of the Madonna are now built over the ashes of a succession of dead Creeds.

If Religion has no exclusiveness to throw around a territory, and cannot establish an absolute ownership over it, can Politics make out an exclusive title to it? It seems to me not. If a statesman object to imigration, that the political system of his country may be changed by it, he is answered by being told that Nature has not guaranteed the perpetuity of his system, or any other body's system. A system will stand just so long as it ought to stand, and no longer. If it is natural, it will be eternal. The entertainment of certain political ideas by a people affords no reason for excluding from their territory one who holds different views of civil society. If he be a monarchist, and is told at the barriers, that the country is a democracy, he may well say—"What of that? I am aware that some soils are adapted to the oak, and others to the pine—but I never heard that any soil was adapted to democracy, and that, for that reason democracy had an exclusive right to grow upon it. All that you can say of your democracy is that the people of this section of the globe like it. So you do, and you have a right to like it, and you have a right to force it upon all who come to you if you can. Every man who joins you does so under the condition that he must conform to your democracy if you have the power to make him conform. That is all there is of it." The danger of a political system being pulled down about the heads of its builders and directors, and a new one erected in opposition to their feelings and wishes, is hypothetical rather than real. But grant that it is real. I then know of but one condition in which a State can prohibit imigration, in order to avoid the danger of having its political constitution forcibly changed. And that is where its territory is filled—and it has as many citizens as its soil can sustain. This condition has never existed, and probably never will exist. And yet it is the only one which will sanction an absolute and general prohibition of imigration. If this protection cannot be had, then there is none whatever. The constitution has got to run its risk of overthrow by the hands of a majority. But it ought not to be afraid of the majority. A just constitution will stand forever. It is embedded in the will of the majority. That is the basis of all permanent government. There can be no other basis, and there ought to be no other—for it is rational and just. The maxim that "the majority is right" when interpreted means, that of a number of men equally wise, and equally good, the determinations of the majority are more likely to be right than those of the minority. It is assumed to be true that men are equal in intelligence and virtue upon the obvious intention of Nature that it should be so. For men are similar in their organization. When a majority wish to change a constitution, it has answered its end and must pass away, Its partizans must submit to its destruction, or seek a new territory.

Let us not be misled by Cant. Out of her utterances lent to the purposes of selfishness and injustice, political proscription has availed itself of several with great effect. "The children of the soil," is a phrase grown familiar to us, and potential too. But what is there of it, save the expression of the accident of material birth—that it took place in Massachusetts instead of Germany. That is all. And how little that is, we can appreciate when we realize the fact that though the birth places of two men, born ten thousand miles asunder, cannot be made even neighbors, yet the men themselves are brothers at the instant of their birth. For they have a common organization and a common destiny.

What is there in those other words "a home carved out for us in the wilderness?" Are they not sheer cant? Whose home is this American Continent? It had sheltered in turn, successive races of animals and successive races of red men, when our European fathers came to it. As they found it, it was used and occupied as a home. To make of it a home for themselves, they extinguished man and beast, and swept its vegetation from the face of the earth. Does it do for us to boast upon such a title? But better than this.—Our European parents, the colonists, were but the advance guard of an army movement from all the States of Europe. Nor was this vanguard made up of one people. There were English, French, Dutch, and Spanish names upon its muster-roll. In the recent mighty emigrative movement from the old world here, we have seen the coming up of the main body, whose advance marched but a little while ago. Whom do these masses meet here but compatriots—and from whom will they hear the inhospitable welcome, "this is our home," but from men of their own blood and their own speech? May it not be said too that the colonization movement from Europe into America has been continuous till this day—that it has been interrupted at no time—the stream varying only in volume and current, but continuously advancing from East to West by a succession of influxes, like a succession of waves encroaching upon a plain, and that therefore it is impossible to say to what part of our population, or to what epoch in the colonization of our country belongs the right of proclaiming to the Old World "this is our home!" Colonists may be considered the missionaries of civilization. They labor, not for themselves alone, not for their children; but for their race. Of them eminently may it be said, their title is a tenancy during the divine will, created by the impressive form, "occupy till I come." At the close of their work, they leave but a vacant possession, and a gift to History.

"The land purchased for us by the blood of our fathers," is another utterance of Cant, as hackneyed, as it is hollow, and much in the mouths of the advocates of an illiberal and exclusive policy. Yet the war of our Revolution is regarded quite generally as conferring an exclusive right upon the descendants of those who fought it through, to control the territory which Great Britain lost at the close of the contest. But all such, misapprehend the nature of a revolution and the character of a patriot. What is a true political revolution? Certainly not the wresting of territory from the possession of one man or of one party into the control of another. Nor is it the forcible transfer of the powers of Government from one set of hands to another. These are but disturbances. A revolution is a change of the structure, or of the forms of the State, in which Wrong rolls under and Right rolls up. It is a triumph of principles. If the change do not come from a conflict of ideas and in which truth and justice prevail, it is not a revolution—but is rebellion or anarchy. A true revolution is based upon the fundamental rights of man. It does not regard party, sect or family, but labors for the race, and though local in its action, its fruits are the property of the World. A revolutionist then is the servant of God, for he is the servant of man. A true revolutionist is a patriot. He is a volunteer in the great army of truth and justice that for all time has waged unceasing battle against wrong and falsehood. He fights not for woods, waters, and plains—for rocks and hills—but compels with the sword the recognition of the rights inherent in man as a social being. He fights for humanity and not for himself. His conquests belongs to his race. Could we if we would, localize revolutionary action, and monopolize its results? Did not the voices of the Girondists and the Jacobins leap the walls of Paris and echo all round the globe—and did not French republicanism leaven more or less every state in Europe? Did the truths contained in our Declaration of Independence and illustrated by the entire history of the revolutionary war, describe the circuit of the old Thirteen States, or did they penetrate every part of this hemisphere, and were they more or less completely absorbed into the political ideas of every subject of every government in the West? Our revolution left us conquerorors on a field, which was not itself the subject of contest—but only the theatre of a contest. Not a drop of blood was shed for the soil we occupy. Its title and possession were never in dispute. We fought for civil liberty.

Now, with the help of the principles we have too briefly evolved, will we find any difficulty in settling the claims of an imigrant to be deemed a citizen, with all the rights and obligations of a citizen, from the moment he enters the country with the intention of making it his home forever. Is he not in the most liberal and in the most literal sense of the word a CITIZEN? Here is he—his wife and children—here are his ambition and his pride—his wants are here right upon him—here his fortune is to make—his capital is here in his hands or head—or occupying small space lies in the bottom of his chest. His interest in the prosperity and glory of the country, in the excellence of its government, and in the wisdom and justice of its laws, is as complete in twenty-four hours after he lands as it would be in twenty-four years. Nay, it is complete the very instant he lands, and at that instant I affirm that he ought to be invested with the right of suffrage.

* * * * *

From a partial view of his case it seems to me, his right can be demonstrated. We allow him to acquire property. The grant is a mockery, if it does not carry with it the right to protect his labor from unfavorable influences, and to save his acquisitions from depreciation by causes within human control. Is it not absurd as well as unjust to say that a man may labor at any Art, or in any department of Science, but yet shall not withdraw his labor from unequal and hurtful competition—that a man may acquire property, but shall not stop a war which will depreciate property—that he may sell his energy and skill, but shall not have any influence in creating a demand for them. Are not all these exceptions repugnant to the grant and void?

* * * * *

The objections to allowing imigrants to vote, and the policy of putting them on a five years probation, are well summed up by the late Chancellor Kent, in these words:—"Strangers on their first arrival, and before they have had time to acquire property and form connections and attachments, are not to be presumed to be acquainted with our political institutions, or to feel pride or zeal in their stability and success."

To work backwards through this conclusion, do we not all know, that no one feels such zeal in our institutions, and such pride in citizenship as the voter of foreign birth, and of scanty property?

Is it not a standing reproach of the editors of the Whig Party of the State of New-York, and particularly of the city of New-York, against their wealthy and native associates, that they are indifferent to political affairs, and can be got to the polls only with difficulty, while the poor members of the party, generally vote, and the poor of foreign birth always vote. The possession of property and an intelligent comprehension of our system and its workings, are not necessarily connected with an interest in public affairs. On the other hand they are naturally and almost unavoidably calculated to distract the interest from the State, and center it upon self. The reason is obvious, and the facts are abundant about us to prove it. We will therefore not delay here. But what connection has property with good citizenship and how does a knowledge of our political system, lead to an appreciation of its worth, and consequently to its stability? From what source has come every danger that has threatened either the spirit of our system—the permanency of our Union, or the quiet of the State? From Burr's Rebellion, down through Burr's project upon Mexico—the Nullification of South Carolina—the Rhode Island rebellion—the Repudiation of State Debts and the doctrines of Anti-Rent—to the causes of the war in which we are at present engaged, every act hostile to the interests of the Union—hurtful to its reputation and dangerous to its existence, has proceeded from native born citizens, and not aliens, and from men of intelligence and wealth—and not from the ignorant and needy—every one of them without exception. The true conservatives in our country are the poor, and the keenest guardians of democratic forms and principles are those who have felt the oppression of power, and who forget, in the equality of citizenship, the inequality of condition. The steadiest man in the State, is the one who has nothing but his labor—and no means of acquiring but by labor—who has the habits of labor and the love of labor. Change has no allurements to him. Disorder is fatal to him. To him, above all others, is our political theory precious; and if despotism, or military tyranny, or anarchy shall ever attempt our form of government, it will be upon the breasts of the poor and the humble, that they will meet their check, and by the hand of labor will they be crushed.

"Acquainted with our political institutions," is the language used by the great Chancellor.—What does he mean;—a knowledge of our laws, and of the spirit and tendency of our institutions—an analytical apprehension of American democracy? If an European were to be denied citizenship till he acquired this knowledge, he might wait forever before he would be qualified. In that sense, few among us are qualified. Or does the great Chancellor intend to say that the foreigner should have a practical knowledge of the great principles of our system before he should be permitted to take part in the government. If he does, then there will be no difficulty in the case. For an hour will suffice to teach the theory that the people govern themselves by laws which they enact through representatives selected by themselves, and which they execute through representatives appointed by themselves. But if he means to say that the foreigner should know the details of our system—the functions of the public officers—the forms of public business, and the questions of policy discussed and decided at the polls, would it not be asking too much? That extent and variety of information is not required of our own native born citizens. No test of intelligence is applied to them, and it would certainly be unjust to apply it to the foreigner. Nor, indeed, is it necessary, either in the case of the native or the foreigner. For what constitutes good citizenship? It is the habit of living an orderly life and of observing the laws—a habit so near to nature that we are unconscious of its operations, except we watch them, as men are unconscious of their breathing except when they listen to it. And in this is the great safeguard of our society from the apparently dangerous admixture of foreign and antagonistic elements. Our laws, and our forms of civil and social life, are adapted to the constitution of man. The imigrant adapts himself to them immediately and with pleasure. The State governs and protects him without his being aware of it, and he yields obedience to the laws, and is a good citizen without knowing it. In one word, he lives naturally.

To refrain from violence, and to respect property—are those difficult things to learn? Is the twentieth part of a century needed to teach them? Does the chafed, fiery, and ignorant Irishman, fresh from the misery and fury of his wretched island, require five years to calm himself into an orderly and quiet man? Do we have to teach him political rights and duties with the whip and the bayonet—or does Nature kindly lead him into his place in the State immediately upon his arrival here, and does he keep it because it is a pleasant place to him—the only place he knows, and the only place he desires to know?

We have long been accustomed to our naturalization laws, and to the idea of a political discipline they are intended to submit the foreigner to, before he takes a part in the government of the country—and are attached to them from the force of habit. But do we ever estimate their practical value with the view of testing their theoretical worth? And what are they intrinsicly worth? What are they worth in a Presidential election? Nothing whatever! Neither the pains and penalties of perjury, or of subornation of perjury—neither the disabilities, nor the fines and imprisonment visited upon fraudulent voting are sufficient to deter unprincipled partizans from presenting and procuring to be presented votes that ought not to be offered, and that are finally forced into the box by false oaths, nor are they sufficient to deter reckless wretches from violating for a price every provision of the election laws. The frauds in our contested elections are innumerable. They are in proportion to the extent and magnitude of the interests at stake—rising in enormity with the importance of the canvass, till the shocking and discreditable fact has become matter of history, that a President of the United States has been indebted for his grand position to a fraud upon the ballot box. The practical operation of the naturalization laws upon our political contests is to throw the chances of a majority into the hands of partizans to whom success is dearer than principle and who resort to crime to ensure it. In this field honorable men can maintain no struggle. They retire from it, and in retiring too often retire from a contest in which good policy struggles against a bad one, and surrender the fruits and consequences of a victory into hands certain to abuse it. Were all citizens voters, the competition for votes would be equal to two parties. Both could maintain it, if neither disgusted and repelled the other by the exhibition of perjury and fraud.

If the apprehension of danger to our system from the exercise of the right of suffrage by European imigrants immediately upon settling in the country were well founded at present, there can be no doubt that all foundation for this fear will be removed when the revolution in our policy now in progress is complete, and the confederacy of interest which constitutes party is broken up. The life of party is office, and the power of party is its patronage. When the people shall elect mainly all of their public officers, and Presidents and Governors shall lose the right of appointing them, the stimulus to activity at the polls will be gone, and candidates for office will have to present other credentials, than adroitness and energy in effecting majorities. Then will voters unsolicited, and unstimulated, permit an election to pass without care except on rare and great occasions—and we shall see throughout the country what we saw a year since in our own State whose Constitution had just stripped the Executive of patronage—apathy on the part of the people, and a falling off in the votes of both parties. Frauds upon the elective franchise will then suddenly cease—for no one will have an interest in perpetrating them, because there will be no reward for perpetrating them.

But in any event, and under any policy with respect to foreigners, we may be sure that Nature will vindicate herself and that right will prevail. They that ought to govern this country and direct its affairs will do so. Here as elsewhere the strong will rule the weak, and the wise will guide the foolish. I care not how many come to us from Europe, nor under what conditions they enter the country. So long as the Yankee preserves his present superior organization, and leads the civilization of the New World, so long will he impress himself and through himself our political forms and principles, upon the entire mass. He stands above all his European associates—and stronger than them all, he will draw them up to him, and they cannot pull him down to them.

In taking leave of this branch of our subject I will again call attention to the point that it is not property only that is the object of governmental care. Persons, and personal interests, and personal rights, are within its province. Every element of civilization is more or less affected by the laws and the administration of the State, and every citizen has a right to try to impress his wants and his sentiments, upon the policy of the State by the ballot, or other appointed means of adapting a government to the wishes of a people.

Our laws give the right of suffrage to male citizens only. Women are excluded from the polls.

It was my privilege, eight years ago to argue before this association, womans right to the right of suffrage. My convictions have experienced no change in the interval. An enlarged knowledge of the character and worth of woman, and a more matured judgment do but confirm me in the conclusion I then attempted to lead my audience to—that the right to vote was inherent in the person of woman as a citizen of the State—and that her enjoyment of the right was entirely compatible with delicacy and dignity, and the discharge of every duty imposed upon her by her organization.

That provision of our Constitution which excludes from the right of suffrage men of color who have not the property qualification has been thoroughly discussed. And I do but speak the sentiment of every liberal and just thinker when I say that the restriction can not get a particle of justification either from right or from policy. It is totally indefensible.

I will now in few words question the equity and the policy of the law excluding from the right of suffrage persons convicted of infamous crimes. But two reasons are given for this exclusion. One is that such persons cannot safely be trusted with the right—the other is that they have forfeited the right by the commission of the crime: that is, the forfeiture is one of the penalties of the crime—is a part of our penal system, and is designed to operate as a restraint from the commision of public wrongs.

As to the first, why cannot persons convicted of infamous crimes be trusted to vote? The answer must be—I cannot imagine the answer in gross to be made to that question. Each different offence would require an exposition of its relation to the public, and of its relation to the right of suffrage. But we will suppose an answer that will give to the law every advantage—and that is they cannot be trusted to vote because they are unjust and corrupt. Then the evidence of their injustice and corruption is the commission of the crime for which they are convicted. That follows certainly. Now granting that in all cases the conviction is right, who is there so ignorant of the nature of crimes and of the philosophy of human action, that he does not know that crimes have no specific, and uniform moral characteristics, and that they are not in themselves evidences of anything except themselves. Who shall say that a forgery evinces the characteristics of theft—that it is an insidious and fraudulent taking away of anothers property—when it may have been committed to give a tempory relief to an overburthened merchant, and to sustain a cherished reputation—when it may have been committed to enable a failing family to maintain its social position. Who shall say it! How is it with the highest offence known to our laws—with murder? Is it uniformly characterized by cruelty—or characterized either by an active love of destruction, or a ferocious indifference to human life? We know that it is not. This one is driven to the act by the stings of a wounded honor. To that woman it is an atonement for a wrong to her which life itself could not repay. Justice demands it in her case and the act is a punishment, springing from a sentiment of right. The crime again is committed in a fit of furious jealousy inspired by love—or it is committed to avenge fancied wrongs—or in defence of imaginary rights. It is done in the frenzy of drunkenness. Shame and wounded pride impel to it; and hunger and cold seek in it a sudden relief from miseries that are intolerable. How widely distant from each other, and from what incongruous sources are the causes which lead to the crime of murder! They have no uniform origin, nor has the crime any distinctive character. Yet in every case the man who is convicted of it is pronounced by the law, an unsafe depositary of the right of suffrage. Is it necessary to argue that this conclusion is an unsound one? Is it not glaringly false? That man ought not to be trusted with the right of suffrage who votes with a mischievous or destructive motive, or who votes in vicious and reckless ignorance of the consequences of his act. Granted! But who ever saw such a man? Was he ever at any poll, from Maine to Mexico? The temper the man was in, when he committed murder, must be his temper when he offers to vote to make the crime a sound objection to him. It will not do to say that because a man was once in his life destructive and cruel he was so, ever thereafter—nor will it do to say that because twenty years since he was unfitted by a burst of furious passion to vote, he continues unfitted to this hour. The reason revolts from such a conclusion. You are driven then in order to maintain your objection, to admit that the convict when he offers to vote is inspired by the same impulses which impelled him to his crime. These may arise suddenly, on the emergency of a contested election: or they must have been contiuuous in their action from the time the offence was committed. The voter must put his ballot into the box in the same spirit with which he put his knife into the breast of his victim. This conclusion however defies the constitution of human nature—and is a sheer absurdity. But granting for a moment that the commission of a crime does permanently modify human character and that ever thereafter all the conduct of the guilty proceeds from a mould bearing the exact impress of his crime, how is it possible that it should express itself in the act of voting! How could a man vote as he forged a note? How could he vote as he committed a highway robbery? What possibility is there of sustaining a spirit of cruelty or rapacity upon a ballot? What is there in the act of voting to excite or to feed either the one or the other? A New Yorker votes in favor of enlarging the Erie canal—it is utterly impossible for us to conceive that in doing so he should be actuated by the feelings with which one man kills another.

But, conceding that certain passions and propensities ought to disqualify for the right of suffrage, the greatest difficulty will be to derive evidence from the commission of an infamous crime, of the existence of those qualities in human character that make a man an unsafe voter. The law gives to every crime a specific character. While it defines its being, it also measures to it a distinctive share of infamy, and in every case, derives its origin from evil. But Truth does otherwise. She judges the moral character of acts by their circumstances. Now a homicide in itself proves—what? Nothing whatever, but that human life has been destroyed. The circumstances under which it was committed must be known, before we can determine whether it was the act of a cruel and depraved spirit, and so was murder in the harsh sense of the law, or whether it was a far different thing. The sense of the whole world accords with the law in its abhorrence of the deliberate killing of a human being for the purpose of obtaining his property. But the sense of a just civilization recoils from the law which stigmatises and punishes as murder, the killing by the victim of seduction, of the villain who worked her ruin by false promises, and who abandoned her to shame and want.

Let us not be concluded by the sweeping declaration of a statute—or by the tyranny of use. Let us look at facts. The citizen who is convicted of having taken the life of another by a blow given in resentment of an injury to what is most precious to man—his honor—is disfranchised. Yet how does one passionate flush of pride and fury effect his capacity to vote intelligently, and his desire to vote honestly? In no way whatever. For otherwise, every burst of furious passion, unaccompanied by destructive force and every mere desire to kill would work a disqualification. A robbery upon the highway, procures the means of relieving the wants of a distressed family. The law calls it an infamous crime, and disfranchises its author. Yet how does the temporary paralysis of a man's conscientiousness, and the excitement of his acquisitiveness and combativeness by an unendurable pressure upon his tenderest affections, affect his capacity to vote intelligently, and his desire to vote honestly? In no way whatever.

Our law disfranchises the forger, though his crime was committed to enable him to meet commercial engagements, and though it was done in the supposed certainty of being able to take up the false paper from means to be derived—say from a conversion of landed property into money. Throughout the fraud runs a trace of justice and duty, as clear as a vein of silver through a rock. The man does not intend to deprive any of the endorsers upon his paper of a particle of their property—nor does he intend fraudulently to obtain advantage to himself at the expense of another. How, then, does a casual yielding of his morality and his prudence into the seductive expedient of forgery, to raise a temporary loan, affect his ability to vote intelligently, and his desire to vote honestly? In no way whatever; and yet the forgery is a forgery, and a crime.

One reason of the law for disfranchising men convicted of infamous crimes, we have said, was because of their unfitness to exercise the right of suffrage, and the evidence of this unfitness was the commission of the crime. Now if this reason is a good one, unfitness to vote ought to be visited with disfranchisement when evidenced in any other manner than by the commission of crime. The crime is but the evidence of the unfitness, and any other description of proof equally good, ought to be admitted, to fasten upon a party the disability that should attach to unfitness. This follows rigidly. Now all conduct is but the expression of character. An external act is but the movement of a muscle—but a mechanical result, if it have not a spiritual impulse. And if it does proceed from the spirit it is but a mechanical result, for good and evil are in the soul, and good and evil are expressed by the soul only through the organs of the body, which of itself has no more moral character than a steam engine, and which acts simply as a piece of machinery as it is moved by the wipsimply of a severe morality, but of truth, an unholy desire executed, and an unholy desire unexecuted are equal in degree of guilt;—more than that they are one and the same thing. The law finds adultery in the physical fact; but Christ found it in the lust, and said, that in the heart already was committed the offence, of which the fact that the law takes cognizance of, is but the outward expression. Let then the characteristics of unfitness to exercise the right of suffrage be what they may—venality, ferocity, treachery, rapacity, falsehood, dishonesty even to a total abnegation of principle, whatever they may be, they are each and all as conclusive testimony upon which to disfranchise a voter, as are the crimes of which they are severally the elements. If there is a sound reason for disfranchising a citizen who has been convicted of an infamous offence on the score of his unfitness to vote then would a just and consistent law disfranchise the venal man, the rapacious, the treacherous, the taker of usury, the trickster in trade, the cruel to animals, the hypocrite in religion, the liar and thief in politics, the oppressor of the poor, those who grasp at inequitable advantages, or push their interests by fraud or trick—each and every of them would be disfranchised. Where would this process of purgation end? How many would be left electors? Few indeed, and they would constitute an oligarchy as remarkable for its virtue as for its numbers. But it would be totally impracticable to make a full and honest application of the principle. It is inconceivable that there should be a registration of the citizens into two classes, the fit and the unfit, the good and the bad. The division never could be made, in the first place, and never could be enforced in the second. And yet, justice and sound reason demand that it should be made and maintained, or that the law should recede from its assumption, that the commission by men of infamous crimes proves that they are unfit to vote.

Now we come to the alternate reason for disqualifying voters convicted of infamous crimes; and that is that they have forfeited the right of suffrage. The forfeiture is a penalty, and like all the penalties of the English law, has a double view—to punish the guilty, and to deter the innocent from crime.

Every rational theory of civil punishment must rest upon rights—the right of society to protect its members from injury, and the right of the offender to have his punishment graduated to his offence, adapted to the constitution of his nature, and directed to the reformation of his character. All beyond this is usurpation and tyranny. Cropping and branding under the common law, were arbitrary exercises of power, in punishing offences. It is needless to say that they were in the highest degree unphilosophical and barbarous. When the State, in adapting a penalty to a crime, has reached that point where it has—(I must risk the phrase) "indemnity for the past, and security for the future," there it should stop. This principle is latent at least, in every penal system which prescribes more than one punishment for offences; and yet how poorly has it been elaborated, and how little has it been infused into the codes? If a violation of one law was a violation of all laws, there would be no need of graduating punishments. But nowhere in the world, out of the pulpit, is this doctrine maintained. The graduation of punishments all over the globe proclaims the universal sentiment of man, that crimes should not be punished with more severity, than is requisite to prevent a repetition of them by the offender, and to compel from him satisfaction for the wrong. This truth seems to be self-evident, and argument will but dull it. Prohibiting a citizen, who has in times past been convicted of an infamous crime, from voting, from giving testimony in a court of justice, from sitting on a jury, is somewhat of an improvement upon the old English judicial pastimes of cropping, branding, and exposure in the pillory. But they are utterly unjust and indefensible. Our punishment for felonies (with the exception of death for a few capital cases) are all by solitary imprisonment at hard labor. We deem this to be the only true system of punishment, for we use it in different degrees for all felonies short of capital, and generally by the tenderness or the scruples of juries in most of those. We have adopted the system from a conviction of its fitness—that it is best adapted to effect the design of all punishment, which is the protection of society, and the reformation of the guilty. In this respect it harmonizes, as it must do, with the constitution of man. The citizen who manifests by his crime that he is inclined to prey upon the rights of others, or is dangerous to the persons of individuals, or to the public peace, is withdrawn from his associations, and shut up for a prescribed period in the society of good books, and his own thoughts. He is regularly employed in mechanical labor, to preserve his health, to keep active his intellect, and to impart to him the happiness and the good resulting from occupation and order. His discipline, his associations, his employments are all designed to restore to society a useful, industrious and good citizen, in the place of the criminal who disturbed its repose or violated its laws, and whom the courts sent away for a season, to a place of reformation. Now no part of this system is the stripping of the convict of the right to vote. This superadded punishment has no place in a scheme of moral reformation, no more than branding or cropping. The disability is vindictive, and vengeance is no element of an enlightened plan of punishment. It is brutal in its spirit and unphilosophic in its aim.

If all convicts were sentenced for life, and none for a term of years, it would be of small consequence whether disability or infamy were heaped upon them or not. But the most of them return to their families and society, and surely it is desirable to have them back, provided and hedged with as many incitements to self-respect and good citizenship as can be given them. Pride, the parent of so much good, should be left to them without a wound. They should not be obliged to feel by galling disabilities that they are distrusted and despised. No mark should be put upon them They should bear no brand rehearsing unceasingly the story of their shame; nor should they be excluded from participating with gentlemen and men of honor, in the discharge of the most important duties of freemen. They should be put upon a footing of complete civil equality with all other men.

Does it not occur naturally to us to ask if it is good policy to prohibit discharged convicts from voting, would it not be better to prohibit them from acquiring property? If the disfranchisement has any virtue, it has it from its character of penalty—and on principle it would seem politic to increase the disabilities convicts now labor under. Why would it not be well to prohibit them not only from voting, but from laboring—from having a home—from bringing suits in courts of justice—from contracting marriage—from participating in public worship? Why? If the principle involved in the penalty is worth anything, it is worth everything, and the reasons that will suffice to maintain the policy or the right of excluding a discharged convict from the polls will be sufficient to prove the right to strip him of every attribute of citizenship and of manhood.

But, once more. The service by a convict of his term of imprisonment, is an expiation of his offence. Society can claim no more from him on that score He has paid the debt and is entitled to an acquittance. For by releasing him from confinement we admit, we admit that he is fit to resume his social functions—that he needs no longer to be seperated from his fellow men and subjected to discipline to reform his character. If he is not so fit he ought not to be let loose, and the system under which he can get a discharge is defective. But if he is fitted to return to society, he ought to return, and return invested with every privilege he enjoyed when he went away.

I am myself entirely persuaded that no evil effects would follow, from allowing discharged convicts the right of suffrage; and I presume every one of this audience is divested of all fear upon this point—not only from the trifling numerical influence of these citizens in a population so vast as that of our State, but from the want of a common object for political association, which would bind them together, and make them formidable as a body. They are too few, too scattered—and of all men in our country have the greatest inducements to identify themselves with the mass.

A spirit of enlightened enquiry ought to, and soon will approach this entire subject—and I am confident that when our laws shall be modified to meet its suggestions that they will extend the right of suffrage to every actual resident of the State without regard to sex, color, or condition, who shall have attained the age of majority, and who shall not be an idiot or a lunatic, or under confinement by the sentence of a court.

If this change shall seem too great to any one—if it shall appear to him to menace the purity and the stability of the elective process and of our representative system, can he not borrow the strength necessary to an absolute confidence in a just principle, however novel or startling it may be by looking at the working of our present suffrage system and rewakening in his memory the dissonant cries of mingled dismay and sorrow, that disturbed the first revision of our Constitution when it was proposed to abolish the property qualification. What one of the ills then predicted has befallen us! Can he not confirm his faith by passing in review the generally excellent selection made by the people of Justices of the Peace, whom the timid and the doubting throughout our State said would be the representatives of the wishes and interests of corrupt and intriguing men, and devoid of firmness and independence when they ceased to be appointed by the Executive.

Does not the most sceptical in political changes feel faith to commit himself absolutely to the truth and the right, when he looks upon our elective judiciary system. How beautiful, how strong, how reliable it is! Our judges—how able, how honorable! And the Convention which gave them to us, how wise it was to rely upon its own convictions of right when unaided by the presence of the great people—unencouraged by the voice of the great people, (for it had no advocate at their door,) it decreed this glorious reform a place in the new Constitution, and continued deaf to the storm of protest that bear about its sessions! Has one of the innumerable ills predicted from this change, befallen us? Have we upon the bench as was foretold to us a single representative of vice or crime, put there by a villain constituency to shield them from justice? Not one, and never will we have!

Oh most safely can we trust ourselves to Truth! Her ample support will never fail. Through every revolution of principle, or of form, however violent to our habits and alarming to our fears, she will carry us swimmingly above the flood, and safe from danger.

Letters from John Quincy Adams to his Son, on the Bible and its Teachings.

The fourth and last point of view in which I proposed to offer you some general observations upon the Scriptures, was with reference to literature; and the first remark that presents itself is, that the five books of Moses are the most ancient monuments of written language now extant in the world; the book of Job is nearly of the same date, and by many of the Jewish and Christian commentators is thought to have been written by Moses. The employment of alphabetical characters to represent all the articulations of the human voice, is the greatest invention that ever was compassed by human genius. Plato says "that it was the discovery either of a God, or a man divinely inspired." The Egyptians ascribed it to Thot, whom the Greeks afterward worshipped under the name of Hermes. This is, however, a fabulous origin. That it was an Egyptian invention there is little doubt; and it was a part of that learning of the Egyptians, in all of which we are told "Moses was versed." It is probable that when Moses wrote, this art was, if not absolutely recent, of no very remote invention. There was but one copy of the law written in a book, it was deposited in the Ark of the Covenant, and was read aloud once in seven years, to all the people at their general assembly in the Feast of Tabernacles; there was one other copy of the law, written upon stone, erected on Mount Ebal. It does not appear that there existed any other copies.—In process of time the usage of reading it thus must have been dropped, and the monument upon Mount Ebal must have perished; for in the reign of Josiah, about 800 years afterward, the book of the law was found in the Temple. How long it had been lost is not expressly told; but from the astonishment and consternation of Josiah upon hearing the book read, its contents must have long been forgotten, so that scarcely a tradition of them remained. We are indeed told that when the Ark of the Covenant was deposited in the Temple of Solomon, there was nothing in the Ark save the two tables which Moses put therein at Horeb. The two tables contained not the whole law, but the ten commandments: the book of the law was therefore no longer in the Ark, at the dedication of Solomon's Temple; that is, about 500 years after the law was given, and 300 before the book was found by Hezekiah the High Priest in the 18th year of Josiah. From these circumstances, as well as from the expedients used by Moses and Joshua, for preserving the ceremonial law and the repeated covenant between God and the people, it is observed that the art and practice of writing was extremely rare, and that very few of the people were even taught to read; that there were few books extant, and of those few, only single copies; the art of writing speaking and thinking with their several modifications of grammar, rhetoric and logic, were never cultivated among the Hebrews, as they were (though not till a thousand years later than Moses) among the Greeks. Philosophical research, and the spirit of analysis appeared to have belonged among the ancient nations exclusively to the Greeks; they studied language as a science, and from the discoveries they made in this pursuit, resulted a system of literary compositions founded upon logical deductions.

The language of the ancient writers was not constructed upon the foundation of abstruse science; it partakes of the nature of all primitive languages, which is almost entirely figurative; and in some degree of the character of primitive writings and hieroglyphics. We are not told from what materials Moses compiled the Book of Genesis, (which contains the history of the creation, and of 3000 years succeeding it, which terminates three generations prior to the birth of Moses himself;) whether he had it altogether from tradition, or whether he collected it from the more ancient written or printed memorials. The account of the creation, of the fall of man, and all the antediluvian part of the history, carries strong internal evidences of having been copied or (if I may express myself) translated from hieroglyphic or symbolical record; the story is of the most perfect simplicity, the discourses of the persons introduced are given as if taken down verbatim from their mouths, and the narrative is scarcely anything more than the connecting link of the discourses; the genealogies are given with great precision; and this is one of the most remarkable peculiarities of the Old Testament: the rest is all figurative; the Rib, the Garden, the Tree of Life and the Knowledge of Good and Evil, the Apple, the Serpent are all images which seem to indicate a hieroglyphic origin. All the historical books, both of the Old and New Testaments, retain the peculiar characteristics that I have noticed; the simplicity and brevity of the narrative, the practice of repeating all discourses in the identical words spoken, and the constant use of figurative, symbolical and allegorical language. But of the rules of composition, prescribed by the Grecian schools, the unities of Aristotle, or the congruities of figures taught by the Greek philologists, not a feature is to be seen. The Psalms are a collection of songs; the Song of Solomon is a pastoral Poem; the Proverbs are a collection of moral sentences and maxims apparently addressed by Solomon to his son, with the addition of others of the same description; the Prophetical books are partly historical and partly poetical—they contain the narrative of visions and revelations of the Deity to the Prophets who recorded them. In the New Testament the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles are historical—they contain memoirs of the life of Christ and some of His apostles, and the proceedings of some of His principal apostles, for some years after His decease. The simplicity of the narrative is the same as that of the Old Testament; the style in general indicates an age when reading and writing had become more common and books more multiplied. The Epistles of Paul are the productions of a mind educated in the learning of the age and well versed in the Grecian literature:

from his history it appears that he was not only capable of maintaining an argument with the Doctors of the Jewish law, but of discussing principles with the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers; his speech at Athens is a specimen of eloquence worthy of an audience in the native country of Demosthenes. The Apocalypse of John resembles in many respects some of the prophetical books of the Old Testament; the figurative, symbolical and allegorical language of these books, shows a range of imagination suitable only to be the record of dreams and visions—their language is in many parts inextricably obscure. It has been, and it is to this day, among the follies and vices of many sects of Christians to attempt explanations of them adapted to sectarian purposes and opinions. The style of none of the books, either of the Old or New Testaments, affords a general model for imitation to a writer of the present age; the principles and rules for composition derived from Greek and Roman schools, and the example of their principal writers, have been so generally adopted in modern literature, that the Scriptures —differing so essentially from them—could not be imitated without great affectation: but for pathos or narrative; for the selections of incidents that go directly to the heart; for the picturesque of character and manner; the selection of circumstances that mark the individuality of persons; for copiousness, grandeur and sublimity of imagery, for unanswerable cogency and closeness of reasoning; and for irresistible force of persuasion, no book in the world deserves to be so unceasingly studied, and so profoundly meditated upon as the Bible.

I shall conclude here the series of letters, which I proposed about two years ago to write you for the purpose of exhorting you to search the Scriptures, and of pointing out to your consideration the general points of application; with a view to which, I thought this study might be made profitable to the improvement and usefulness of your future life. There are other and particular points to which I may hereafter occasionally invite your attention. I am sensible how feeble and superficial what I have written has been, and every letter has convinced me more and more of my own incompetency to the adequate performauce of the task I had assumed; but my great object was to show you the importance of devoting your own faculties to this pursuit; to read the Bible is of itself a laudable occupation and can scarcely fail of being a useful employment of time; but the habit of reflecting upon what you have read is equally essential as that of reading itself, to give it all the efficacy of which it is susceptible. I therefore recommend to you to set apart a small portion of every day to read one or more chapters of the Bible, and always read it with reference to some particular train of observation or reflection. In these letters I have suggested to you four general ones. Considering the Scriptures as Divine Revelations; as historical records; as a system of morals; and as literary compositions. There are many other points of view in which they may be subjects of useful investigation. As an expedient for fixing your attention, make it also a practice for some time to minnte down in writing your reflections upon what you read from day to day: you may perhaps at first find this irksome, and your reflections scanty and unimportant, but they will soon become both easy and copious. Be careful of all not to let your reading make you a pedant or a bigot; let it never puff you up with pride, or a conceited opinion of your own knowledge, nor make you intolerant of the opinions which others draw from the same source, however different from your own. And may the merciful Creator, who gave the Scriptures for our instruction, bless your study of them, and make them to you "fruitful of good works!"

From your affectionate father,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Distress in Ireland—Eating of Human Flesh.—The following is an extract of the speech delivered by Mr. Reynolds in the British House of Commons, April 11, during the discussion on the bill to punish seditious speaking with transportation for seven years or for life:

All the towns of large population in Ireland were quiet and obedient to the law; and yet Honorable Members, who knew no more of that country than of New Zealand, said they would vote for this bill because Ireland was disturbed. He denied the allegation, as a libel upon his country. Let Honorable Members consider the distress that existed. Let him remind them that, in Ireland, 1,000,000 of human beings had sunk into their graves from starvation within eighteen months. Let them remember the horrible case that within a fortnight had been brought before the Galway Assizes, in which a man had been convicted of sheep-stealing, and Mr. Dobbin, a stipendiary magistrate, had applied in favor of the prisoner, on account of the extenuating circumstances in his case. One of his children had died of starvation, and the wife of the man had fed upon the flesh of that child before he violated the law to procure food. Mr. Dobbin had caused the body to be disinterred and the limbs were found picked to the bone. In that case the judge shed tears, and the jury shed tears, and the jury shed tears, and the man was discharged. That case was an illustration of the widely-spread and terrible distress under which his countrymen were suffering.

Population of Paris.—Of the population of Paris, nearly one half are working and laboring people, the rest follow some trade or profession or live upon their income. It is said that there are nearly 100,000 servants, and about an equal number of paupers. There are at no time less than 15,000 patients in the Hospitals, and four times that number pass through the hospitals each year. Twenty thousand foundling children are constantly supplied by the state, and as many infirm persons, incapable of work. The average population of the prison, is stated at 4000.

It is said that families, constantly residing in Paris, soon become extinct, and that out of the whole population, not more than 1000 individuals, can reckon their ancestors, as inhabitants of Paris, from father to son, farther back than two hundred years. A Parisian youth of the second or third generation, has the form and manners of a woman —seldom has any children that live, and thus it is that all families, which, from taste or necessity, pass their lives in Paris, are irrevocably doomed to extinction.

Extraordinary Remains.—While some persons in the employ of Maj. Bates, of Guernsey, Ohio, were engaged in quarrying stone for the repair of the national road, on the hill west of Cambridge, they found, in a petrified state, what was supposed to have been the body of an Indian child, which, perhaps centuries ago, was deposited in that rpot. This extraordinary specimen of ancient remains was found imbedded in a mass of solid rock, and has the appearance of a strange image, somewhat imperfect in its outward form, yet having the general appearance of the human shape. The material of which it is composed appears to be a species of limestone. In the same cavity was also found a small row of what appeared to have been Indian beads, matted together.—Cleveland Herald.

Materialism and Idealism: A Dialogue.

[Scene, Prof. Longhead's Study.]

Prof. L.—[alone.] Mankind are becoming problematical. It is difficult to solve the mysteries of their nature. They are merging everything into the abstract and the abstruse. Ultraism in every thing is the order of the day. Principles as well as actions are all carried to the ne plus ultra. Alas, for the sober views of our rational forefathers! they are vanity in the eyes of the ten thousand Solomons of the present age. Every wheel in the machinery of human thought is turned by the breath of Haste. The intellectual world has the poles of its axis inverted, and nothing moves in the right direction. The sentiments of Locke and Bacon are now all moonshine; and even Reid, and Stuart, and Abercrombie are misguided dunces! Indeed, the system of things is so completely changed, that all metaphysical views of half a century's standing, are shown to be false. Even the poetical "calculations" of such intellectual astronomers as Shakspeare, will not answer for any latitude on this remodeled globe. Instead of all the world being a stage, and all the men and women sober players, it has become a steamboat, and all mankind inveterate steamers.

[Enter Mr. Arctosh.] Arc.—Prof. Longhead, I am heartily glad to find you at home. I have long had an itching desire to explain my new science of things to you.

Prof. L.—I will listen to an exposition of it with the utmost pleasure, and I presume it will be with much profit.

Arc.—Well, then, to come right home to the subject at once, every thing is actual.

Prof. L.—Actual what?

Arc.—Why actual reality—real substance. The world is composed of things, and we cannot conceive of a thing which has not tangibility.

Prof. L.—But there are two worlds; the natural and the intellectual.

Arc.—I recognize but one, and that is as much as we can handle in our discussion.

Prof. L.—I know it is, if we take the intellectual. for there is nothing to hold on upon, (smiling) it being immaterial.

Arc —(After a short pause.) Every thing consists of things.

Prof. L.—Well, let us come to some point—to particulars. What sort of a thing is genius? Is that corporeal?

Arc.—Certainly, nothing can grow but the corporeal; genius grows, therefore genius is corporeal. The genius of Shakspeare, which was too small to be discovered for some time, has at length become a prodigious giant. Milton's, in its infancy, was no bigger than a Lilliputian; now it is a full grown Brobdinag: and a genius of Modern size feels in its presence as insignificant as Gulliver did in the fingers of the giant sixty feet from the earth.

Prof. L.—I must confess your views are enormous.

Arc.—Views are of all sizes. While some are enormous, others are so small that thousands of them could roost on a musquetoe's bill.

Prof. L.—Really you believe views are material!

Arc.—I do. The brain is full of them.

Prof. L.—What is the most marked characteristic of these animals, (smiling) or in other words, to speak phrenologically, what are their strongest developments?

Arc.—Locality.

Prof. L.—But do they never migrate?

Arc.—Only from one part of the brain to another.

Prof. L.—People sometimes change their views; how do you reconcile that?

Arc.—We all have different classes of views, or rather, they are divided into parties, just as people are in politics. One party conquers to-day and we are led in a certain direction: to morrow, another party predominates, and we take a contrary path. This is all we mean by changing our views.

Prof. L.—You make the cranium a sort of battle field, where mock heroic deeds are done.

Arc.—Not so much of the mock heroic as you may suppose. The fate of nations is often pending on the issue of these conflicts. Had not the martial views of Napoleon got and maintained the mastery in his head, Europe would wear a very different face from her present one. The fact is, those little invisible monads which cause the brain, as Ben Jonson says, to be "rammed with life," are "clothed in a little brief authority." They govern the man.

Prof. L.—Your thoughts are so amusing that—

Arc.—Thoughts are amusing and musical too. Did you never feel a buzzing in your head? That is caused by the uncommonly loud flapping of the wings of thought. They are then drumming on the nerves of the brain just as a partridge does on a log. Thus has it been ever since the morning stars pitched their first tune, or rather ever since the Adam of thought lit up the brain of our universal forefather!

Prof L.—I fancy my ideas are about giving a concert or an oratorio; and if it would not be a disappointment to you to leave this subject where it is till another time, I should like to be alone for a while.

[Exit Arctosh.]

Prof. L.—A fair sample of the crazy metaphysical speculators of the day. Well, it does no good to reason with such deluded beings Their views have become so incorporated with their brains, that it would be as difficult to remove the one as the other. But I must turn my thoughts from these phantasmagorias, or like some of their mushroom generators, I shall soon imagine myself astride of a flash of lightning, playing upon a thunder cloud—calm as a lady at her piano—causing the sun and moon to vibrate, and the stars to leap in ecstasy from the sphere of their eternal gyrations. (Seats himself and takes a newspaper. Enter Dr. Vagueman.)

Dr. V.—Good evening, Professor Longhead.

Prof. L.—Ah Doctor, you have come at a lucky moment. I have been straining my nerves of thought in order to ascertain the meaning of certain mysticisms which I find—

Dr. V—Straining nerves of thought! Thought is immaterial and cannot be strained.

Prof. L.—I only used a figure of speech.

Dr. V.—But speech has no figure. Why talk of the form of a thing formless. Things are intangible and invisible; ergo, they are without shape. Ahem.

Prof. L.—Dear Doctor can you tell me the composition of Jacob's ladder?

Dr. V.—(With much seriousness.) It was an immaterial essence, like everything else.

Prof. L.—Immaterial like every thing! That brings us to the point where I wish to stick at present. The straining before spoken of was occasioned by reading a short poem in this old paper, the Dial, which was devoted to the interests of Transcendentalism. This article, it strikes me, deals in some such metaphysical or mystical speculations as I have heard you express. I cannot understand it.

Dr. V.—Perhaps I can render it.

Prof. L—I wish you would rend it. I should like to examine it piecemeal.

Dr. V.—Very well. Rend it, a line or so at a time, and I will dissect as you go along.

Prof. L.—The article is headed stanzas—

Dr. V.—Stanzas—that signifies anything. It is a name given to a poem that has no name. The word in the original imports a preamble to a poetical resolve. Hem!

Prof. L.—Umph!—I will now read:—

"We are spirits clad in veils,"*

Dr. V—Certainly man is an abstraction.

Prof. L,—But can we conceive of an abstraction clad in a veil?

D. V,—O, that is a mere form of expression.

Prof. L.—But according to your views, expressions can have no form.

Dr. V.—No,—yes—well,—you know what I mean. My view of the thing is this: Man, like our ideas, is an idea. He is a certain something, which, viewed metaphysically, is nothing. We talk of the functions of man, but no one ever saw them. They are the mere essence of what is left after every thing is taken away. Yet it constitutes the whole man. We speak of eyes, by which we can mean nothing more than imaginary orifices through which the meteors of vision shoot. We speak of the senses—of taste, smell, touch, &c., but who ever felt of a touch. They are all abstract essenses, and yet they constitute the man. You see the bard of Avon lied when he said we "are just such stuff as dreams are made of," for neither we nor dreams are made of any thing. We are abstract, incorporeal idealities. When we say man is a sentient being we speak absurdly; an abstraction cannot be endowed with sensation.

Prof. L.—Then man has no more feeling than this floor. (Stamping on the Doctor's toes)

Dr. V.—Oh! my soul and body!

Prof. L—I thought you had no body—was incorporeal. But what is the matter?

Dr. V.—Matter! you've crushed my foot. (Rubbing it.)

Prof. L.—Oh, ho! I thought your foot was an insensible abstraction.

Dr. V.—Do read along; and be in haste, for I can't endure this. (Still rubbing his foot.)

Prof. L.—(Reading,)

"Man by man was never seen,"—

Dr. V,—Certainly, abstractions are invisible.

Prof L.—

"All our deep communing falls
To remove the shadowy screen."

Dr. V.—We cannot penetrate a veil woven of shadows or any other essence.

Prof. L.—Shadows and essence.

Dr. V.—Read along. (Still writhing.)

Prof. L.—

"Heart to heart was never known;
Mind with mind did never meet"—

Dr. V.—Abstractions cannot meet,

Prof. L.—

"We are columns left alone
Of a temple once complete."

Prof. L.—What does that mean?

Dr. V. (Hesitatingly.) It means—why, I suppose—yes, it means that we are broken columns of the temple of Babel.

Prof. L.—But that was a tower, and never completed.

Dr. V.—Then it was completely unfinished. We are spoken of metaphysically; and so is the temple or tower, and both are destitute of tangibility. Had Diogenes known the essence of man he would never have lit his lamp in the day time to find one. Knowing that "man by man is never seen," he would have kept out of sight himself.

Prof. L.—Your reasoning reminds me of another anecdote of Diogenes. Plato defined man a two legged animal without feathers. Diogenes forthwith caught a "rooster," stripped off his feathers, and presented him to Plato as a man.

Dr. V.—You may read another verse.

Prof. L.—

"Like the stars that gem the sky,
Far apart though seeming near,
In our light we scattered lie;
All is thus but star-light here."

All is "star-light." That is what we mean when we say all is moonshine, eh? (Smiling.)

*This article with the exception of the last verse, is taken verbatim from the Dial.

Dr. V.—(Gravely). It is a further exposition of my views of metaphysics. All is like light, whether star-light or moon-light: that is, all is without tangibility. We have no more idea of the moon's beams than of her horns, which visionaries speak of. An account is somewhere given of darkness which was so thick that it could be felt; and it so blinded the people's eyes that they could not see to light a lamp by which to look at it. Such darkness as that would stare at Aladdin's lamp, I guess. Crazy-head verse-weavers tell of catching the fleeting moments as they pass, as though we could fill our hats with little winged minutes and seconds just as we used to stuff our pockets with butterflies and grasshoppers in the schoolboy time of life. Now the fact is, all this, like the wings of the fantastic bardling's imagination, is itself imagination. It is composed of such materials as the axis of the earth, Cadmus' soldiers, Pandora's box, Jupiter's trident, Mercury's wand, and Vulcan's bellows—all windy abstractions, like every thing else. Who ever in reality ate the sugar loaf of friendship, or drank the sweet cider of young affection, The fact is, these are mere bread and molasses terms, coined simply to fill up the œsophagus of the man metaphysical. Hem! But you may read the next verse.

Prof. L.—And glad am I to say it—the last.

> "What's our social company
> But skim milk devoid of cream?
> Like the Realist's philosophy
> 'Tis the blubber of a dream."

Dr. V.—That is a thrust at the doctrines of the anti-idealists, who, like yourself, believe the moon is composed of green cheese, and that ideas are a species of owl that hoot in the hollow caverns of the brain.

Prof. L.—Are you serious, Doctor?

Dr. V.—I certainly am, for I perceive you have no faith in my speculations.

Prof. L.—Well, to be candid, I have not. Furthermore, I think they are too whimsical to be seriously combatted But do not charge me with such views as you have just accused me of harboring.

Dr. V.—The charge will not produce a shock, I presume.

Prof. L.—I am shocked at your blindness and your impudence.

Dr. V.—The shock is mutual. Dunces alone will deny the correctness of my views.

Prof. L.—Dunces alone will waste time in listening to their expositor, or bear his insults; so be off immediately, or I will show you, by demonstration upon your back, [seizing a cane] that a hedgehog is not devoid of sensation.

Dr. V.—Well, well, I'll be off if you'll only keep your cane away from my feet.

[Exit Arctosh.]

Prof. L.—O these intolerent, self-sufficient, dogmatical ultraists! There is no getting along with them. To use reason with them is madness. Two-thirds of them are laboring under a hallucination of mind. They will neither listen to, nor can they understand, sound reasoning. They have raised the battering ram of misguided fanaticism against the walls of their understanding until the fair fabric is nearly demolished. They have combatted their judgment until it is completely dethroned, and folly has become their sovereign dictator and guide. They are Don Quixots at the windmill.

NOTE.—This dialogue, one of our academic efforts, in its younger days fell a victim to misplaced type.

THE UNION MAGAZINE is profuse in rich embellishments; and Mrs. Child, Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. C. H. Butler, the editor, and others, have presented worthy offerings at the shrine of Literature. As Mrs. Kirkland, the editor, has gone to Europe, the readers of the Union may soon look for some very entertaining sketches of travel from her pen,

Mr. CRITTENDEN opposed both the bill and the amendment with his usual force and eloquence.

Mr. FOOTE defended the measure and the administration, and without taking the question the Senate adjourned.

Georgia Gold Region—Gold Diggers.

Correspondence of the National Inteligencer.

DAHLONEGA, (Geo.) April 30, 1848.

The Cherokee word Dah-lon-e-ga signifies the place of yellow metal; and is now applied to a small hamlet at the foot of the Alleghany Mountains, in Lumpkin county, Ga., which is reputed to be the wealthiest gold region in the United States. It is recorded of DeSoto and his followers that, in the sixteenth century they explored this entire Southern country in search of gold, and unquestionable evidences of their work have been discovered in various sections of their work have been discovered in various sections of the State. Among these testimonials may be mentioned the remains of an old furnace and other works for mining which have been brought to light by recent explorations. But the attention of our own people was first directed to this region while yet the Cherokees were in possession of the land, though the digging of gold was not made a regular business until after they had been politely banished by the General Government. Soon as the State of Georgia had become the rightful possessor of the soil, (according to law) much contention and excitement arose among the people as to who should have the best opportunities for making fortunes; and, to settle all difficulties, it was decided by the State Legislature that the country should be surveyed and divided into lots of forty and one hundred and sixty acres and distributed to the people by lottery. For several years subsequent to that period deeds of wrong and outrage were practised to a very great extent by profligate adventurers who flocked to this El Dorado. In the year 1838, however the Government established a branch mint at this place, since which time a much better state of things has existed at Dahlonega.

The appearance of this village, though not more than a dozen years old, is somewhat antiquated, owing to the fact that the houses are chiefly built of logs, and, having never been painted are particularly dark and dingy, but uncommonly picturesque in form and location. The population of the place is about five hundred. It is located upon a hill, and though the country around is quite uneven, having been deeply ravined by atmospheric agents, when viewed in connexion with the mountains, (some ten or fifteen miles off,) which seem to hem it on three sides, presents the appearance of a pit to a magnificent amphitheatre. On approaching Dahlonega I noticed that the water courses had all been mutilated with the spade and pickaxe, and that their waters were of a deep yellow; and having explored the country since then, I find that such is the condition of all streams within a circuit of many miles. Large brooks (and even an occasional river) have been turned into a new channel, and thereby deprived of their original beauty. And of all the hills in the vicinity of Dahlonega which I have visited, I have not yet seen one which is not actually riddled with shafts and tunnels. The soil is of a primitive character, quite yellowish in color, composed of sand and clay, and uncommonly easy to excavate with the spade. Heretofore the gold ore of Lumpkin county has been obtained from what is called the deposite beds, but the miners are now beginning to direct their attention to the veined ore, which is supposed to be very abundant in all directions.

It is generally found in quartz and a species of slate stone. The gold region of Georgia, strictly speaking, is confined to a broad belt, which runs in a northeastern and southwestern direction from Dahlonega, which may be considered its centre. Several auriferous veins traverse the town, and it is common after a rain to see the inhabitants busily engaged in hunting for gold in the streets.—That huge quantities are thus accumulated in these days I am not ready to believe, whatever may have been done in former years. I know not that any very remarkable specimens of gold ore have been found in the immediate vicinity of Dahlonega, but an idea of the wealth of the State in this particular may be gathered from the fact, that several lumps have heretofore been found in different sections which were worth from five hundred to one thousand dollars. More valuable specimens have been found in North Carolina; but while Virginia, the Carolinas, and Alabama have all produced a goodly amount of gold, I have heard it conceded that Georgia has produced the largest quantity and decidedly the best quality.

And now with regard to the fortunes that have been made in this region. They are very few and far between. But, by way of illustration, I will give two or three incidents which have come to my knowledge. In passing, however, I may repeat the remark made to me by an intelligent gentleman, that the expenses of digging out the gold in this section of country had ever exceeded the gain by about one hundred per cent. Immense amounts of labor, as well as money, have been expended, and, generally speaking, the condition of the people has not been improved; the very wealth of the country has caused the ruin of many individuals.

The following story is a matter of popular history. After the State Legislature had divided the Cherokee Purchase into lots and regularly numbered them, it was rumored about the country that lot No. 1052 was a great prize, and every body was on tiptoe with regard to its distribution by the proposed lottery. At that time 1052 figured in the dreams of every Georgian, and those figures were then far more popular than the figures 54 40 have been in these latter days. Among the more crazy individuals who attended the lottery was one Mosely, who had determined to draw the much talked of prize or purchase it of the winner, even though it should be at the cost of his entire property, which was quite large. The drawing took place, and 1052 came into the possession of a poor farmer named Ellison. Mosely immediately mounted his horse and hastened to Ellison's farm, where he found the child of fortune following the plough. The would-be purchaser made known the object of his visit, and Ellison only laughed at the impetuosity of his impatient friend. Ellison said he was not anxious to sell the lot, but if Mosely must have it, he might have it for $30,000.—Mosely acceded to the terms, and in paying for the lot sacrificed the most of his landed and personal property. The little property which was left him he was compelled to employ in working his mines; he labored with great diligence for several years, but he could never make both ends meet, for his mines were not at all distinguished for their richness.

In process of time he was compelled to sell 1052 for what it would bring, and having squandered that remnant of his former wealth, he left the country for parts unknown, a veritable beggar.—But, what is more singular than all, the present proprietor of 1052 is that identical man Ellison, who is annually realizing a handsome sum of money from the newly-discovered gold ore found in the bowels of his lottery lot.

Another instance of good fortune, unattended with any alloy, is as follows: Five years ago a couple of brothers, who were at work upon the Georgia Railroad, took it into their heads to visit Dahlonega and try their luck in the mining business. They were hard-working Irishmen, and understood the science of digging to perfection.—

They leased one or two lots in this vicinity, and are now reputed to be worth $15,000.

The deposite gold is extracted from the gravel by means of a simple machine called a rocker, which merely shifts and washes out the metal.—The vein gold is brought to light by means of what is called a pounding mill, which reduces the rock to the consistency of sand, when the ore is separated by the use of quicksilver.

The Mint establishment is quite large, and has a commanding appearance. It was erected in 1837, at an expense of $70,000, and the machinery cost $30,000. It gives employment to nine men, who receive for their services, collectively, $12,000. The Superintendent is J. F. Cooper, (son of the famous actor,) the Coiner is D. H. Mason, who has a very interesting cabinet of materials, and the Assayer is J. L. Todd. The Dahlonega Branch Mint and the one located at Charlotteville, N. C., are the only ones which coin the gold on the very spot where it is found.—The New Orleans Branch, as well as the mother mint in Philadelphia, are chiefly occupied with foreign ores. Of the two first mentioned, Dahlonega has thus far been the most successful, the coinage in one year having amounted to $600,000. At the present time, however, the business of this Mint is said to be on the wane. The coinage of the branch mints is uniform with that of the mother Mint, and it is all systematically tested there. It thus appears that the whole establishment is a branch of the Treasury Department.

The smallest amount of ore received at the Dahlonega Mint has to be worth $100. When the miner has obtained a sufficient amount, he takes it to the Mint and receives the allotted sum. The operation of coining is performed by the power of steam, and may be briefly described by the words rolling, drawing, cutting, and stamping. Some of the Dahlonega gold is said to be as pure as any in the world, but it is commonly alloyed with silver; and yet silver ore is no where found in this section. The value of pure gold is one dollar per pennyweight: and every genuine American eagle is made to contain one-twentieth of silver and one-twentieth of copper.

A Wail for the Smitten.

BY MISS M. MENDER.

A wail for the Smitten! ay, weeping and wail
For the wing of the Smiter hath swept o'er the vale!
And shroudings, and sackcloth, and silence and woe,
Mark the flight of the Angel in dimness below.
While the green sod lies broken o'er many a breast,
Where the young and the lovely are gathered to rest!

Oh! sad were the hearts in that sheltering home,
As he folded his wing o'er a fair cradled one!—
For no sign bore the lintel that threshold to guard,
When the Summoner came in the name of the Lord!

And the deep hush of midnight woke mournfully there,
To the wrestling grief of a mother's prayer,
As she bent o'er her babe with a shielding clasp—
Though the fluttering pulse and the moaning gasp,
Gave token to all, save a mother's eye,
That the harpers of Heaven were floating nigh!

Death writeth her childless!—those prayers how vain,
To win back the cherished to earth again!
Now the last faint tint from the lip hath fled,
And she kneeleth in silence beside her dead!

And he passed by a group of boys at play,
As they trundled the hoop away! away!
And merry and clear, on the air rang out
The gladsome tones of that summer shout!
But a shaft hath sped from an unseen hand—
And one shall be missing from that bright band!

Anon came a group of joyous girls,
With the light winds lifting their golden curls!
And their hearts were gay with their dreams of bliss!
Could the Spoiler look on a scene like this?

Yet I noted one as she lingered nigh,
With a saddened smile in her downcast eye!
A gentle girl, of unsullied cheek
And lofty brow—but withal, so meek,
That I marveled much as I gazed thereon!—
She too, fair girl! was a stricken one!

A dirge for the sire when doomed by fate!
And tears for that home hearth so desolate!
A knell for the mother in matron pride,
For she slumbereth low by the loved one's side!

To princely hall, and to peasant's cot,
The Spoiler hath come—and he spareth not!
Unto youth, in his manhood's glorious prime,
And the maiden in life's own sweet spring time!
While weary age o'er his staff bent low,
Draws shuddering to Jordan's icy flow!

But thanks be to God! for that conquering faith
Which hath robbed the sting from the victor Death!
For joy to the Christian—life's labor done—
When Azrael's summons shall call him home!

My First Parlor—A Sketch.

BY M. A. DENISON.

"Yes, and we're to have a beautiful little parlor, grandmother. Arthur has ordered an elegant sofa, a superb pier glass, a rosewood centre table, lively chairs to match, and a carpet of such a pretty style of pattern, I know you will like it, 'tis, so neat.

And why is it, grandmother," continued the volatile girl, as she glanced around the large old-fashioned room, "why is it that you have never had a parlor? I'm sure you can afford it well enough. I asked grandpa yesterday, and he looked sad for a moment, as he replied, 'go to your grandmother, Anna and she will tell you.' I'm sure I forgot it till just this very moment, and now we are alone together, you must give me your reasons."

The speaker was an elegant young woman, of eighteen summers, seated at the feet of a grave and dignified elderly lady, whose fair smooth brow and dark hair spoke still of youth lingering with age, like the fresh green ivy clinging to the decayed and tottering wall.

"Dear Anna," she replied in subdued tones, "you have often heard me speak of my little Willie, my first, my only son; yet I have never told you the circumstances connected with his death. Here is a little manuscript, which I have lately written; take it, and if you read it carefully, it will not, I trust, be time misspent.

"O! thank you, dear grandmother," exclaimed Anna; "if it is any thing you have written, I know it will profit and interest me too."

Saying this, the fair girl eagerly took the manuscript, and bounding lightly from the room, wended her way to a beautiful garden, in the midst of which was a bower, completely covered with the clinging grape-vine, through which peeped at intervals, rich clusters of roses, shedding their delightful fragrance all around them.

Anna entered; and flinging the loose curls from her heated brow, sat upon the low rustic bench, and with pleasure in every lineament of her speaking features, prepared to read what follows:

MY FIRST PARLOR.

"Never shall I forget with what sensations of delight I walked through the pretty little cottage, forty years ago, which I was soon to call my own.

The old homestead, where I had frolicked in gleesome childhood, with its venerable mantle of moss, and its antique form, was but a little distance away, and I could look from the chamber of the cottage into the tidy farm yard, and hear the plaintive lowing of dear old Brindle, my pet cow. True, I could not see the sweet face of mother, nor the sterner countenance of father, at every hour of the day; yet it was but a bit across, and a few moments' walk would carry me there.

With all its home associations, there was nothing in it half so pretty as my little world of a cottage.

The exterior too was very beautiful in my eyes; first, there was a neat little rail fence all around it, a long path lined with rose bushes, leading to it, a sweet garden spot, and behind it a meadow, fresh and extensive.

The cottage itself was painted the purest white and the blinds the greenest green.

I knew nothing of its interior previous to the week in which we were married, and dear William, (not a whit the less dear now) intended to surprise me; so when I entered to inspect the whitewashed walls, and polished floors, lo! and behold it was all furnished throughout. A pretty little Yankee clock, all g lded and shining in the bright sunlight, greeted my vision first. It stood just opposite the fire place, and over a brightly varnished oaken table. Clean, new yellow chairs around the sides of the room, a little cupboard near the shining hearth, and a pair of tiny andi rons, with their little black dog faces looking straight at us, made me laugh outright with plea sure.

And this, be it remembered, kind reader, was our best, our very best room; was it not a beauty in my eye, and was there ever a happier or prouder little maiden than this very self, as I thought this is to be mine, my own home?

The kitchen, although with less costly materials, was furnished nearly the same, except that in one corner was an array of burnished pans, kettles, pails, and so forth. Under the shelves, a long line of new wooden tubs, and all thing essen tial to a good housekeeper's comfort. They spoke loudly of scalding suds and heaps of unwashed linens, clothes pins and lines, red fingers, blustering winds and freezing cold days, but I was not afraid of them, for I had been educated by parents, industrious and economical, who never forgot that soul and body were united, and therefore were to be educated together.

But I have dwelt enough on minute particulars: suffice it to say, that the whole cottage was tasteful and neat without and within; a perfect little nest of comfort.

Well, we were married; time sped on, shook his trembling finger at us, but "touched us gently." Our hearts grew more united, my William was temperate and frugal, and we prospered.

By and by a letter came to us, from relatives whom we never expected to behold; and the first we had ever received from them, stating that they were tired of a city residence; also, their wish that we would look out for a large and convenient cottage, as they should remove thither the next spring.

For the first time, my best room, in fact, everything, looked too small; and my furniture had a thin coating of meanness. I had often heard from my uncle, who had visited them when he went to the city, that they were wealthy, lived superbly, and everything about them was on a grand scale.

Their cottage was selected, a new and beautiful one, situated on a gentle declivity, surrounded by lovely orchards, and a little distance from a most romantic waterfall, and in the rear of rich grounds, which, if cultivated, might become a fragrant and delightful garden.

They came on; or rather the lady, with her children and furniture came first, and in a week after their arrival, were settled in their new house. Never shall I forget the morning, when I made ready to receive her first visit. Everything, however clean and shining it might be, required a second and thorough scrubbing or rubbing. Baby was taken up, its little frock smoothed, its clean rosy face wiped over and over again. The little looking glass in the clock, (by the way we had no other) was consulted at least a dozen times, to see if the then young lady, writing this little reminiscence, was dressed with sufficient taste. Husband's hair was smoothly combed and curled, and his hat drawn closely over his brows, with an injunction not to take it off for fear the wind would blow it awry while he was at work; and it would never do for him to comb it before the lady, to be sure.

His nice wedding suit, too, was laid carefully upon the bed, that he might slip quietly up stairs, when he saw the visiter approaching; and everything was in readiness by two o'clock.

By and by a carriage was seen winding slowly down the road, and my heart beat with anticipation, I will not say fear, as I took a hasty survey of the apartment, smoothed baby's frock down once more, and saw husband skip by me, and leap up the stairs two at a time.

As it neared the little path, which we had dignified with the name of 'Wild Rose Path,' and stopped, a lady, I supposed, for I hardly knew, stepped out and walking leisurely along met me at the door. By her side ran a little white headed fellow plucking my choice plants, without hindrance or a denial from his mother.

I did my best to welcome her, and she entered with me, and passed along through the room, as though, (poor I thought,) she was to be ushered into a better.

I blushingly offered her one of my yellow wooden chairs, upon which she sat with great condescension.

Declining to take off her bonnet and shawl she began, in a very small tone indeed, to converse with me; praised my baby, said it was very fat, and rosy; enquired about my parents and my husband, and then sat very stiff and silent. Not so with the boy; spying my cupboard, he pointed his puny hand at it, crying out—

"Ma, ma, that's such a cupboard as you gave Meney for her parlor, 'aint it? You know Meney, don't you?" he continued turning towards me, "she used to be mama's chambermaid, but she's married now."

I was foolish enough to feel mortified and I know I appeared so; but just then my William came down, looking so noble and handsome, that I felt confidence immediately. As I introduced him, I was pleased to see Mrs. Montgomery look at him with some astonishment. His clear, full eye never flinched at her gaze, and he returned her bow with the air of a prince; I'm sure I was proud of him then.

Very soon after, the lady, with her ill bred boy departed; perhaps as glad to leave, as I was to say "good by."

William laughed heartily, as I related the incident about the cupboard; but I could not so readily overlook it, and wished the poor unoffending thing, I forget now, but believe it was somewhere in Guinea.

Let me hasten. The visit was returned—the magnificent parlors opened for us, the lady's three children, dressed in Parisian elegance, were paraded before us, with 'he of the cupboard' at their head. They insisted upon our staying to tea, to show their munificence I suppose, and we accordingly sat down to a table loaded with silver plate, and overloaded with delicacies.

Let me here hint, that "parlor" was a word almost unknown in that time; many very wealthy farmers resided here, but they all had nothing more nor better than a 'best room," plainly furnished and sparingly decorated. Pride had not even found a resting place for the sole of her foot.

I returned home rather discontented; the best room, I will not disguise it, looked thoroughly mean. The walls, too, seemed desolate, the floor covered with poverty's carpet, that is, no carpet at all.

Baby was cross, (the poor little creature had taken cold,) all was out of humor and every thing seemed wrong. Instead of our cheerful fireside chat, an oppressive silence weighed down our spirits for some time.

At last—before I was aware, I murmured, "I wished we had one."

"What is it, Ellen, a parlor?" exclaimed William, divining my thoughts. "well, you shall have one, but you will find no more happiness in it, than in our snug and comfortable little room."

"But can we afford it?" I asked almost beside myself with pleasure.

"Yes," he replied, "I can afford to buy furniture for a parlor, but I am afraid you will then be discontented with the rest of our house."

"O no! no!" was my answer; "we can take the large room up stairs, that has never been used; and then I should rather have down stairs just as it is, because it will look as if we studied comfort, you know."

My husband's keen glance, and my own answer condemned me instantly; yet he seemed to feel a sort of pleasure in my enthusiasm, and finally informed me that he had spoken with a gentleman respecting some handsome furniture, which he could have very cheap, as it was second hand, though it had been in use not over a month

"You must go to-morrow and see it yourself, and choose such articles as you want," he added.

To this I joyfully assented, and full of pleasing anticipation, I retired to rest.

In the morning, with a beating heart I prepared for my excursion. It would take the greater part of the day to go and return.

"What will we do with Willie?" asked my husband.

"Carry him over to mother's, dear, of course," I replied; "he is asleep now, and I can take him nicely wrapped up, without any trouble." I started as I bent over the cradle.

"He looks feverish and breathes hard," said William; "are you not almost afraid to leave him so long?"

"He does not, indeed, seem very well," was my reply, "but then I can go to-morrow?"

"No, this afternoon the sale comes off."

For a moment I was undecided. "You know he has been just this way often, William," I ventured to say, "and mother is a better nurse than I am; besides he dont seem so very unwell either; I think we had better go, it is only a little cold that he has taken."

"Just as you say," he replied; and accordingly we carried my little treasure and gave it in charge of my excellent mother. A singular feeling came over me as I laid it in her arms, and I lingered, almost hoping she would tell me I had better not leave it.

In a moment this had passed, and I was on my way to G———. When we arrived there it was near noon. It took some time to select and determine what articles I wanted, and when we seated ourselves in the wagon it was almost three o'clock. I had never before been so long away from my baby; and oh! how my heart yearned to clasp it again.

It seemed to me, as I neared my father's house, that lightning speed would not have been swift enough for me, and when William reined in the horse, I sprang from the wagon without assistance, ran to the hall door, and was just opening it, when, to my astonishment, Dr. Grey, our family physician, came out, but not recognizing me, as it was quite dark, passed on.

For a moment I almost sank upon the door-step. A faintness, deathlike, came over me, a fearful presentiment weighed down my spirits. Yet I dared not stay. William had secured the horse and come after me, as I bounded in and wended my way up the dark staircase to my mother's room. I dared not enter. I trembled like an aspen leaf, and my breath seemed almost gone as I listened. All was quiet, save now and then a singular noise, and I thought, a sob. William, to shared in my wretched forebodings. At last he whispered:

"Some of the family is sick: we had better enter at once,"

"No, no, not yet," I whispered, "William, can it be our baby? Can it be our Willie?"

My husband passed his arm around my waist to support me, as a voice exclaimed in a tone of anguish—"Oh! if his mother were only here!" then opening the door, almost carried me into the room

What a fearful scene was there before me. My boy, my darling little Willie, was struggling in the agonies of death.

White as a corpse, his dark eyes wild and restless, his bosom heaving while the hoarse rattling breath escaped, oh! what a sight for a mother.

My parents stood on each side of the bed, my brothers and sisters were weeping all around me, for Willie was almost an idol in our family. As I stood for a second speechless and nearly bewildered my baby saw me; he must have recognized me, for he raised his white arm toward me, and almost ceased that terrible breathing.

I rushed towards him, and pushing the mourners aside, raised him in my arms, and clasped him tightly to my bosom. How can I forget that wild beating heart, that laid so close to mine in the death hour?

"Mother," I exclaimed with tearless eyes, "he cannot be dying, he must not die, call in Doctor Grey; he must save him, I cannot part with my boy now, oh! Father in Heaven," I continued, as I saw the mist creeping over those beautiful eyes, and the livid blue, around the dear little lips, "Why did I leave my child?" I laid him upon my lap, and parted the silken hair, on his tender forhead; clasped my hands, and wildly, aye sinfully prayed God to spare him; then I pressed my hands heavily upon my eyes, and strove to forget that it was a reality. When I looked again the little lips were wreathed into a lovely smile, the dark eyes upturned to my own, he breathed gently yet quickly—the agony was passed. For an hour I sat with that beautiful head upon my arm, dreaming that he was only sleeping, as had been his wont in the hushed twilight.

Then, and not till then, did the whole weight of my wo fall upon my deadened spirit; I arose, laid him on the bed, to be robed for his burial, and sank down insensible beside him.

It was noon, on the day following. I had not seen my boy since he died. Weak and exhausted from mental suffering, I crept from my chamber into the room below, to take one more look of all that remained of Willie.

I entered softly—my husband stood over the coffin, weeping as only a man may weep in bitterness. Not a reproachful look or word had he given me since that fatal hour. I stole beside him and mingled my tears with his. He had just placed a white rosebud within the little plump hand of our baby, and it laid sweetly on his breast, as he laid upon his cold pillow. As we stood silently together, the heavy rumbling of cart wheels sounded in my ear. In another moment Alice, my little niece, put her head softly within the door, and almost whispered, while her lip quivered with grief, "Aunt Ella, the furniture has come; where shall it be put?"

My anguish, who can tell at this fearful announcement? William's frame shook with emotion.

The coveted furniture was the cause of all my sorrow; had I taken my babe when I first saw the symptoms of the cruel disease—the croup; had I not been so craving, my beautiful babe had been spared me; for so the doctor assured me, would have been, in all probability, the case.

"O, William!" I exclaimed, "can you ever forgive—can you ever love me again?"

I shall never forget his answer. Lifting my head from his shoulder, he replied gently:

"Ellen, who else have I to love now, but you?"

Well, it is all past, yet it seems but yesterday. I heard the heavy clods rattle on his coffin; yet regrets are useless now; he is a happy angel in heaven. I did not keep the furniture, and though it may seem foolish, I cannot endure the word 'parlor.'

The furniture I disposed of, for I could not bear the sight of that which caused me to neglect my babe; and when I see a young mother more anxious for show and company than the welfare of her child, I remember the dreadful occurrences that accompanied my efforts to furnish "my first parlor."

Soft shadows crept all around the bower, and twilight was gathering them together, as Anna finished the little sketch which her grandmother had furnished her. Tears stood in her eyes as she arose and murmured:

"I almost wish we were not to have a parlor."

"Say, rather," exclaimed a manly voice, "that you will never allow vanity to take the place of affection in your heart, even for a moment."

The young girl turned and beheld her lover, who had been standing near, unknown to her.

"I have heard all you have been reading, from your grandfather; but come, the night air is damp; let us go into the house, dear Anna; but before we depart, let us promise each other, that we will always be careful in thought, word and deed: then we may look back with delight, instead of regret, upon our first parlor."—Boston Traveller.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

JAMES RIVER, May 1, 1848.

What idea do people form of James River?—That it is a dark, low, inconsiderable stream, struggling its way through a low, flat, vapid country, and then losing itself in Chesapeake Bay? Nothing can be more erroneous. It is a broad, bold, athletic river, pushing vigorously and vivaciously for the sea. Those indeed are noble waters all around that region where it has its embrochure.—They are characteristically American,—ample, rich, rolling their volume in majesty along, as if proud of the country to which they belong. Yonder below, is that basin of water called Hampton Roads, sufficient to float the navies of the world. Old Point Comfort juts out its green bosom into the cold waters, while the huge fortress opposite reposes sullenly on its submerged stone-built foundation. It was named after that plain, quiet, hard-working President, James Monroe, who, having felt the disadvantages of a defenceless state in time of war, entered on the expenditure of millions for military defences. If Monroe was lavish of the public money, he was not niggardly of his own, for he had little to spare of his $200,000 at the end of his term, A. D. 1825. I recollect seeing him on the evening of the third of March in the Chamber of Representatives, wearing and old plaid cloak after the fashion of that day, quite worn and faded. It was the expiring hour of his Presidential life, and he who was never ostentatious, felt less than ever like making a show. The occasion was the delivery of a lecture by Robert Owen, Sen., father of the late Indiana representative. He was a dull lecturer, long, prosy, involved, obscure, so that one could not know "what he would be at." Yet he fancied himself the predestined Regenerator and Restorer of the social condition of man, the Liberator of his race from conventional prejudices and civilized despotism. Where are the results of his long and wearisome labors?

The next day Monroe resigned the cares and honors of State to John Quincy Adams, on whom the burden fell with great weight. The democracy of the country was angry at his election, and resolved to "spare no arrows" until they had disenthroned one of the purest and noblest statesmen that was ever entrusted with office. Monroe retired to mingle his dust with the Virginia soil, like that of Washington, Jefferson and Madison. Travelling up this river brings these things to mind. Then, too, we have just passed the house where Gen. Harrison was born. It is in Berkley county, and stands right on the margin of the river,—a large, lofty, fine looking house, constructed of brick in the fashion of the last century, and the early part of this, and preserved in good order. The plantation around appeared to be flourishing. This spot the old General visited just before his inauguration, and in one of the private rooms of the mansion, frequently occupied by his mother, is said to have composed that paragraph of his Inaugural, in which he expresses the most elevated views of the dignity and importance of the Christian religion.

But there is one thought that besets the mind like a spectre while traversing this stream. It is, that over its bosom floated the first slave-ship that ever cursed these waters. That was a dark and ominous hour, pregnant with evils to our beloved country. Oh, had that day and that deed been blotted from the roll of time! The landing of that cargo was like the opening of Pandora's box.—How widely has the plague been diffused! What a feverish action is it this moment giving to the circulation in the body politic. And where slumber the power that can eradicate it from the vital blood of the republic? But for this, what a commerce would enrich the Capes of Virginia; what fleets of merchant ships would swarm in her noble waters, what merchant princes would dwell in rich and flourishing cities.

Norfolk, so finely situated, is said to have reached the maximum of population, at which it has slowly arrived—fifteen thousand—perhaps a third of those being negroes, or the descendants of imported slaves. Western Virginia is pressing upon Eastern, and demanding emancipation. It wishes to throw off the unsightly carcase. But difficulties thicken around the work. Garrison abolitionists are constantly throwing obstacles in the way. These reprisals on the property of slaveholders, as they and the Constitution regard it, provoke the pride and wrath of men who may be won, but will not be driven into any path of duty.—That Potomac expedition has put far back the cause of emancipation. At the same time Southern men feel that they are threatened by the steadily advancing tide. So Senator Butler of South Carolina expressed himself recently. The spirit of emancipation, like some invisible power, is believed to be drawing its parallels closer and closer to the entrenchment of the slaveholder, and to be preparing the way for demanding an unconditional surrender. This will never be made without a struggle, that will convulse the very foundations of society. Looking at this fine country, it does seem lamentable that the foot of a slave ever put its fatal imprint on the soil; but Virginia is silently throwing off the hideous thing, and will one day be revealed in her beauty. But to insolent dictation she will never submit. She, and she alone, must do it; for if there be a point in the whole circle of the political system, on which the slaveholding States are sensitive and uncompromising, it is the point of State sovereignty.

Higher up the river is the site of old Jamestown, where the first colony was planted, and so often withered away.

What a struggle for existence was that! How far more promising is that colony on the coast of Africa. If it be not a moral miracle, it is a wonderful enterprise, crowned with a success unsurpassed if not unprecedented, in the history of colonies. Not Jamestown, but Richmond—not Plymouth, but Boston, were destined to be the capitals of the two mother commonwealths, the parents of a progeny of States, the fame of whose enterprise, wealth, and power, has filled the world. Hither are turned the eyes of those people that have so long groaned under the ancient despotisms of the Old World. How rapidly has Republican stock risen in the year 1848!

RICHMOND, May 2.

Arrived at the capital—the city of hills and vallies—of wealth and hospitality—the most growing town in the State. Beautiful churches have arisen on every side, their tall narrow spires shooting high in the air. Noble dwellings adorn these spacious streets, but let us pass by them all, and look for Marshall street, for there is the old house where lived the great Jurist of the Republic, after whom the street is named, familiarly called in Virginia the "Old Chief;" that calm, keen-eyed, intellectual, cogitative man, whose library was in his head, and whose steady hand held so gracefully the scale of Justice. Here he lived in this house which stands at the intersection of two streets, an old fashioned porch affording entrance on two sides of the domicile, and a few old trees occupying at random points the area of the yard. Other inmates than those of the family now inhabit the dwelling, but the spirit of the great man seems to linger round the place of his domestic repose, for a domestic man he was, whose strong and tender affections clung around the sacred shrine of HOME with a childish devotion. He had no fancy for pomp and parade anywhere—not even on the lofty judicial bench in the temple of justice—much less amid the serene associations of home. Walking to the cemetary on the confines of the city, I stood beside a grave, on which pressed a tabular monument with this inscription:

"Sacred to the memory of
Mrs. MARY WILLIS MARSHALL,
Consort of John Marshall.
Born 13th of March, 1766,
Departed this life of the 28th day of December, 1831.
This stone is devoted to her memory by him
Who best knew her worth,
And most deplores her loss."

It was from the hand of her husband, John Marshall, who survived her four years, and then took his rest by her side. There, beneath a single monument, reared by the hand of filial affection, reposes the dust of that great expounder of law, and umpire of contending States. The city of Richmond, it is said, asked the privilege, and offered the pledge, to erect a noble mausoleum to the illustrious dead, but neither enjoyed the one, nor redeemed the other. This corporate negligence must not be ascribed either to the diminution of esteem or the decay of veneration for that renowned name, but probably to that spirit of procrastination and forgetfulness, so common to collective bodies, which are truly said to have no souls.—Ready hands and devoted hearts supplied the deficiency, so that there is no air of neglect around the grave of the Jurist, such as is said to be visible around that of Jefferson. Not a line of eulogy is carved on the monument of the Chief Justice—the time of his birth, marriage, and death, only being inscribed. He was born in 1755, and died in 1835; so that he was literally an octogenarian, and such an one!

News from Europe.

EXCITING SCENE IN PARIS.—Only last Sunday Paris was the scene of one of those extraordinary demonstrations which can only occur in that capital. Fortunately it passed off without bloodshed; but whether the causes which occasioned it, and which may produce its recurrence at any moment are not still actively at work, our readers shall judge. A. M. Blanqui, stung to madness by the publication of certain papers alleged to be found at M. Guizot's, which impeached his political character, fulminated a most bitter philippic against the Provisional Government, declared the documents published to be forgeries, and inveighed against M. Marrast and M. Lamartine in terms not easily to be forgiven. He swore to overthrow the government, and he appears to be a man whose ultra opinions give him no little influence with the communist party. It seems that a plot was actually formed to intimidate the Provisional Government, eject M. Lamartine, M. Marrast, and other moderate members therefrom, and form a new government consisting of Ledru-Rollin, Cabet, Blanqui, Albert, Louis Blanc, Flocon, Arago, Raspail, and Pierre le Roux. A meeting was accordingly got up at the Champs de Mars, on Sunday, with this ulterior object. Blanqui harangued the mob.

However, Lamartine and Marrast having got previous intelligence of the plot, circumvented their designs. The national guards, as well as the mobiles, were called out, and the critical state of things, which threatened a complete reign of terror, furnished the Government with a pretence to call in the military, all classes now deeming the lately proscribed troops of the line as the defenders of order, life and property. A couple of regiments were brought into Paris. Cannon, for the first time since the Revolution, was placed before the Hotel de Ville. Of the National Guards of Paris no fewer than 120,000 assembled on the quays and boulevards, joined by 40,000 of the banlieu or suburbs; to these were added 20,000 of the gardes mobiles, and this body, between which and the national guards some jealousy had previously existed, fraternised as they passed each other, and their common differences were buried in oblivion. The peace of Paris was thus secured. The usual exhibitions and speeches took place before the Hotel de Ville, and the cause of the communists sank apparently into insignificance.

A counter demonstration is of course threatened. In the course of the tumult at the Hotel de Ville, Cabet stigmatised Lamartine as a traitor to the republic. Lamartine withdrew, and, having consulted with his colleague, orders to arrest Cabet were issued in the course of the evening. There can be no doubt that the whole affair tended to strengthen materially the moderate party in the Provisional Government. Another "unlimited" circular, published in Paris, on Saturday last, in the name of M. Ledru-Rollin, contributed very greatly to indispose the Parisians to countenance the communists. Its violent tendency rendered the name of M. Ledru-Rollin so unpopular that he was compelled to disavow its authenticity, and that it had been issued from his department without his knowledge and sanction.

It is evident that the sensible and moderate men of the Provisional Government have been secretly, if not openly, at variance with the extreme party. On the Saturday evening previous to the Sunday's demonstration, high words took place between M. Marrast and M. Ledru Rollin in the Council. M. Ledru Rollin applied the opprobrious term lache, or coward, to M. Marrast, whom he accused of betraying his principles; M. Marrast followed this up by a blow; he struck M. Ledru Rollin, and the other members interfered and prevented further violence. Indeed, it is openly asserted, that the plot of Blanqui and Cabet, on the Sunday, which so signally failed, was favored, if not concerted, by the extreme party in the Provisional Government, which, if it be true, must lead to its speedy re-construction.

Thus stood matters on Monday. On that evening Blanqui harangued his club, inciting them, in the most violent language, to arm and overthrow the Government. He invited the people to pay no more taxes, to raise the wages of the workmen to five francs per day, and compel the rich to minister to the wants of the sick and aged proletarians—the new classical name for the "shirtless." Commissaries were appointed to come to an understanding with a vast number of other clubs who advocate similar principles. It is now evident that the contest between the moderate clubs and their more violent antagonists has fairly commenced. The rappel was again beaten on the morning of Tuesday, the 18th. Vast numbers of National Guards were kept under arms during several hours, perhaps with a view to weary them out, and the whole capital was kept in a continual state of terror and confusion. It was stated that both Blanqui and Cabet were arrested by order of the Government. The report is put forth actively that the members of the Provisional Government are now again on friendly terms, and that all differences have ceased.

But whilst secret arrests of the communists are taking place in different parts of Paris, it is idle to count upon the permanence of tranquility for a single day.

Free Suffrage in England.—We perceive that an attempt is about to be made to get up a fresh agitation for the purpose of obtaining an extension of the suffrage, an equitable arrangement of taxation, a reduction of expenditure, and a general advance of reform principles throughout Great Britain and Ireland. A meeting has been held in the metropolis, at which, we understand, about forty members of Parliament assisted.

Mr. Hume has been appointed chairman, and Mr. Cobden vice-chairman of the new association. The names of the Radical party who assembled at the meeting have been published; and we see amongst them those of Sir Wm. Molesworth, R. Osborne, W. J. Fox, Dr. Bowring, J. Bright, W. Scholefield, J. Macgregor, Colonel Thompson, T. Wakley, and all those names which are usually to be found in the division lists of the Liberals, and which may be classed as the extreme Radical party.

The Scotch Chartists.—Intelligence has reached us of the regular organization of the Chartist forces in Scotland. A public meeting has been held at Aberdeen, for the purpose of electing a delegate to the "National Convention," and measures were adopted for the enrolment of volunteers. After the public meeting about 1,000 persons adjourned to the Union Hall. Five hundred members were enrolled as a "National Guard;" and after some correspondence with Birmingham, respecting the supply of arms, had been read, it was resolved, that a gun and a bayonet should be ordered for each member forthwith.

Lord Brougham's Application to the French Government.—Lord Brougham, in presenting the petition from the Earl of Dundonald on the national defences, took occasion to state, with reference to his application to the French Government to be naturalized in order that he might become a French citizen, that his sole object was the protection of his property in that country; and, in desiring to become a French citizen, he did not wish to divest himself of his rights as a British subject. It must not, however, be supposed that by this step he had shown any favor to the French Republic, or that his opinions as to a Republican form of Government were at all modified.

The War in Denmark.—The Schleswig and Holstein Duchies are now the seat of open war.—We were enabled in our last number to record the first actual battle which has taken place, in which the Danes were victorious. No fewer than 1400 fell on both sides, including members of the noblest families in the country. The corps of students were completely cut up or taken prisoners by the Danes. The whole of the Prussian troops have now advanced into the Danish territory.—The artillery was to cross the Eider on the 13th inst. A skirmish was reported to have taken place since, near Eickenforde, in which the Danes were defeated; but, if true, it must have been an inconsiderable affair, and not likely to have any influence on the ultimate success of the campaign.

In Prussia there seems a growing feeling that the Polish-Prussian provinces would be relinquished; but the uncertainty which yet prevails respecting the movements of Russia, leaves all those questions which virtually affect the political existence of Eastern Europe in a state of abeyance. Prussia seems proceeding vigorously to arm her vast population.

Congressional.

Senate.—Mr. Dix presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York in favor of the payment of French claims, from spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. Upham presented a resolution of the Vermont Legislature in favor of Mr. Whitney's Railroad project.

The Yucatan bill was then taken up and after a personal explanation between Messrs. Calhoun and Foote, Mr. Houstot made an able speech in support of the bill. He defended the war with Mexico, and charged that annexation produced the war, and not the march of troops to the Rio Grande, which no more produced the war than the march of Gen. Taylor's force to Corpus Christi.

Mr. Jefferson Davis moved to take up the volunteer bill, which would give the President the necessary means to act promptly.

Mr. Johnson of Md., moved that the bill be laid on the table, which was debated by Messrs. Hannegan, Calhoun, Houston, Crittenden and Westcott. After its passage Mr. Cass moved to call upon the President for all correspondence relating to Yucatan, which was adopted.

House—After the transaction of unimportant business, Mr. Vinton, of Ohio, moved that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole, on the state of the Union. Adopted.

Mr. Hilliard, of Alabama, in the chair, and took up the Land Bounty bill, in favor of officers promoted from the private ranks of the army, and others.

The bill and the amendment was discussed at some length, which closed by confusion and uproar in the way of numerous and ridiculous amendments.

The Committee finally rose and reported the bill without any amendments, which was read a third time and passed.

Senate.—Mr. Johnson's resolutions calling on the President for information in regard to the nomination of certain officers of the Army, was postponed till tomorrow.

Several adverse reports were submitted by the Committee in relation to private claims, which were adopted.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the Yucatan bill, and Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, addressed the Senate, discussing the question involved in the bill at considerable length.

When he had concluded Mr. NILES obtained the floor, and the Senate adj.

HOUSE.—The House took up the Wisconsin bill and passed it as amended in Committee.

Mr. BOCOCK addressed the House upon a motion formally made by him to reconsider the bill regulating the compensation of Postmasters. He said that the postmasters derived an increase rather than a diminution of the compensation. The reconsideration was carried, and after various amendments had been effected to the bill it was referred to the Postoffice Committee.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, TOOMBS, of Ga., in the chair, and took up the Revolutionary Bill.

Mr. ROCKWELL spoke warmly in defence and justification of his former speeches, in which he exposed certain blunders and mis-statements of the Secretary of the Treasury. He brought up fresh charges of errors, and produced vouchers to prove his assertions.

This subject was farther discussed by Messrs. Strong, Vinton and Sawyer.

After which several amendments were offered to the bill, but without action.

The committee rose and the House adjourned

WASHINGTON, May 12.

SENATE.—A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the passage of a bill for the admission of Wisconsin into the Federal Union, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. Douglass, of Illinois, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill from the Committee on the Public Lands, in favor of granting public lands to Iowa for the construction of a railroad connecting the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, which was read twice.

Mr Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill amending the act for the adjustment of land claims in Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and in parts of Louisiana and Alabama.

Mr. Bagby, of Alabama, moved to take up the bill for the payment of interest on moneys advanced by Alabama for advances made to the Government of the United States, during the hostilities with the Creek Indians. The motion was agreed to, and the bill came np, on Mr. Pierce's amendment of extending the principle to all the States which had advanced money to the Government, which, after some discussion, was adopted. The bill as amended was then read a second and third time and passed.

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, moved to take up the bill relating to Bounty Lands, reversing the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions in relation thereto. After being amended and considered, it was read a third time and passed.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, moved to take up his resolution, calling upon the President to communicate to the Senate the names of officers serving in the army, whose nominations had been withheld from the Senate, with his reasons for so doing, which was agreed to, when Mr. Johnson resumed his speech in support of the resolution, and reply to Mr. Allen. He mainly directed his argument in defence of what he conceived to be the constitutional rights of the Senate, and of the limitations to Executive authority. After he had concluded, the subject was informally laid aside.

After the transaction of some other business of no leading interest, Mr. Cameron, of Pennsylvania, moved that the Senate go into Executive session, which was agreed to; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were opened and the Senate adjourned till Saturday, (to-morrow.)

HOUSE.—The House met at 11 A. M., and was called to order by the Speaker, when the journal was read and approved. After the transaction of some routine business,

Mr. Goggin, of Virginia, moved to reconsider yesterday's vote respecting the compensation of postmasters, which was carried; but the bill was passed and sent to the Senate.

Mr. Rockwell, of Conn., moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the regular order of business, which was agreed to; whereupon the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Cabell, of Florida, in the chair, when the private calendar was taken up.

The first thing in order was the bill for the relief of Mr. Mead, which was discussed at length by Mr. Woodward, of South Carolina, Mr. Lincoln, of Illinois, Mr. McLane, of Maryland, and others. The committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

A motion was made to lay the bill on the table. The yeas and nays were demanded, and resulted in the affirmative, by yeas 118, nays 38. On motion, the House then adjourned over till to-morrow, Saturday.

CHIHUAHUA.—The Official Register of Durango says that private letters state that 400 of the American forces in the capital of Chihuahua and Rosales, were advancing with four pieces of artillery to take up a position at Rio Florido, and that a battalion of 500 Texans had left Saltillo, in the direction of Bolson de Mapimi, and 900 more toward the frontier of Zacatecas.

The Vice Governor of the State sent a note to Gen. Price on the 4th ult., requesting him to withdraw his forces to the line which they occupied before the 1st of March last, according to the stipulation of the articles of the armstice.

The editor adds: "We do not know the general's reply, but private letters state that he has said that he is not subject to Gen. Butler, but to his Government at home, from which alone he will receive orders." The Progresso has a similar statement, on the authority of a private letter, substituting the name of Gen. Scott instead of Gen. Butler.

PAREDES.—Paredes at last advices was at San Luis. He was at liberty, and does not seem to have any knowledge of the purpose of the Supreme Government to arrest him. He is living in a retired manner, and is making no public demonstration in behalf of his favorite projects.—New Orleans Picayune, May 5th.

FRAUDS IN OPIUM.—About twenty cases of opium were sold at auction today by John Tyler. It was imported from Smyrna and Liverpool in various vessels, and to all appearances was of equally good quality. Notwithstanding this, however, its price varied from $3 45, $1 35, 6 cents to 3 cents per pound. An exposition of the fraud was made at the sale. It is said to consist in the extraction of the morphine, or vital principle of the drug, before exportation. This fraudulent opium was invoiced at a lower price than that of the first quality, but still greatly above its real value.—Boston Traveller of Monday.

THUNDER STORM.—We learn from a gentleman who came from Auburn yesterday morning, that a very severe thunder storm occurred at that place on Saturday afternoon. The Telegraph office was the special rendezvous of the electric fluid. All communication eastward from this place by the wires was stopped for the day.—Rochester American.

A Ballad.

"He told me I was beautiful;—
As beautiful as young,
And praises clothed in burning words,
Fell from his flattering tongue.

"I thought his heart was all my own,
'Twould never go astray.
But woe to me, when last we met,
He coldly turned away.

"The smiles that once were mine alone,
Another maiden bless;
And hers are now, each burning vow,
And hers, each kind caress.

"The hopes which fancy painted bright,
Were, fleeting as the dew,
The vows he spoke, how soon he broke!
How soon he proved untrue!"

Thus mourned a sad forsaken one,
And thus her tale she told,
Where gliding through its ancient woods,
The Juniata rolled.

Poor girl!—a lesson sad she learned,
But not more sad than true:
The love inspired by beauty's charms,
Is fleeting as the dew.

Loose Ends of Thought.

Thoughts in the mind may come forth gold or dross—
When coined in words, we know their real worth.—

A thought is so much gained worth saving, and when written down it is there. It is so much of the crude ore, at any rate, which may be assayed and its value ascertained, or its worthlessness discovered at our leisure. If of worth, it may prove the precursor of others of equal or greater importance.

To any one the practice of recording his thoughts is useful—improving to the mind and chastening to the imagination. To examine and fix our opinions on right and real grounds, we should look at them on all sides—view them in different lights, which can be accomplished most thoroughly when they are written before us.

Many valuable ideas have been lost at the time, because they were not committed to the keeping of paper—but those of no worth, though recorded upon leaves of brass or pillars of stone, have gone to a deeper oblivion. No word of truth having once fit utterance, shall wholly perish, but falsehood and cant shall crumble the monuments, and mildew the page to whose care their promulgation has been given.

To know how easy—yet how difficult to do. One may be perfectly convinced that a certain course is the only proper one, yet have very little power or inclination to walk there in—may understand well what should be, yet be content to let what is, however far from it, remain unchanged. O, how evil passions and habits will cling to the soul, making one despise himself that he is so powerless and changeable. Happy is he whom it leads to the "STRONG for strength to break the galling chain. Self-reliance can never do it We are never stronger than when we feel most deeply our weakness and insufficiency.

Thoughts of which we know not the origin or the occasion, and that glance thro' the mind so quickly that we can neither record nor remember them—all dim and shadowy as they are, often exert an immeasurable influence upon our actions and feelings. Why do we think of this thing or that at such an opportune moment, at times—and at others when the occasion and place for it are past, or have not yet arrived? What vague and unexplained law of association and reflection governs the flow of our ideas?

A spirit of perverseness sometimes seizes us and makes us act contrary to our better feelings—makes us do little disagreeable things just because we should not do them. This furnishes the only satisfactory solution of one-half the quarrels between the best of friends. It rather grates upon our self-love to feel that they possess, however worthily, so much power over us,—so we, in some such way, attempt to show off our independence.

Little opportunities of doing good are neglected by many, while waiting for an occasion to perform great acts of charity. Few have the will and the means for high deeds of benevolence, hence none should forget that the cup of cold water was commended and written in Heaven, while the rich man's alms, heralded abroad by the trumpet, had its empty and short-live tones for their only blazon.

Experience, on most subjects, gives by far the best materials for conversation—but on some, those who know, are those who say and think the least.

I long for Peace—the peace serene that laps
The spirit in realms of rapt Elysium.
A peace that breathes an air of calm content—
A holy joy—a thrill of quiet bliss,
Where we ask nothing more but to be 'left
All undisturbed, to finish out our dreams:—
Love fills our souls, and we are well beloved,
No torturing doubts, or boding fears disturb,
But Honor, Love, and Truth, bear sovereign sway.

ROYALTON, N. Y. J. H. BIXBY.

A GENEROUS MAN.—Acts of kindness and generosity are so rare and unfrequent, at the present day, that when they do occur, they seem like a refreshing shower, falling upon the parched earth. Our readers all recollect the melancholy explosion of Claudius C. Williams' fire works establishment, which occurred last week; by that unfortunate accident he lost all, but, through the kindness of friends, he was at once enabled to recommence business. Mr. W. having occasion to purchase some lumber, called upon Mr. D. Allen, of Jamestown, N. Y., who had an abundance of that article at our wharf. Mr. Allen let him have all he wanted, utterly refused security, and gave

Mr. W. his own time to pay the debt. This is pure and disinterested friendship, and particularly so, when we reflect that Mr. W. was an entire stranger to Mr. Allen. Such acts of goodness, in these selfish days of money-making mania, deserve to be recorded.—Cincinnati Chron.

THE PROGRESS OF THE GLACIERS.—The following extract gives a melancholy picture of the gradual enlargement and extension of the glaciers, an enemy, by which, however slowly and silently, the fertile valleys of the Alps in Switzerland would seem destined, ultimately, to be overwhelmed and lost to the uses of man. It is from the "Switzerland in 1847" of Theodore Mugge, recently translated from the German, and published in England:

"In travelling through the Kander Valley, I had the company of a pleasant, intelligent man, a pastor, who, in spite of rain and wind, gave me a great deal of information concerning the mode of life of the people of his parish, as well as concerning the mountains around, with which he appeared thoroughly acquainted. He confirmed the account I have invariably heard from inhabitants of the country, that the glaciers and masses of ice on the Alps are constantly increasing, and the pasture land diminishing in the same proportion. Many a valley he was himself acquainted with, which in the last century fed large herds of cattle, where now scarcely as many single head can pick up a scanty subsistence. Thus, for instance, the Gasser Valley a hundred years ago afforded pasture for six hundred cows during the summer; fifty years ago about half that number could find food; now it will barely support seventy. The same complaint I heard repeated in many different quarters by the herdsmen on the Furka, and in the Grisons. The ice and snow are continually augmenting; the glaciers are pressing down more and more into the valleys, and filling them up; the temperature is sinking; the soil deteriorating and growing marshy. What can be the cause of this alarming change? Are the Alps rising higher, forced up by some powerful action of subterranean fire? a cause that is conceivable with the chalk formations; or does this alteration of climate proceed from accidental causes of a temporary nature? This much is certain, that where large trees once grew no tree will grow now; and that large roots are found beneath what is now everlasting snow. In some valleys, where the mountain sides are clothed with firs, they are obviously dying away, and no art can make a young plantation prosper. In the Ursern Valley the few pines left by Suwarrow remain, but they do not increase; and, in descending from the Wengner Alp, at the foot of the Jungfrau, to the Grindelwald, you see to the left a number of dying pines, whose blackened branches have as spectral an appearance as those on the Altenfiord, in Norway, beyond the polar circle. On the Wengner Alp itself attempts have been made for years to encourage the growth of trees—they will not succeed; and it is not till three or four hundred feet lower that they flourish in luxuriant vigor."

READERS OF NEWSPAPERS.—It is curious to observe the different effects which the various articles of intelligence have on different persons.—Thus one person will turn up his nose at an article on manufactures and railroads, and look for paragraphs on more frivolous subjects—one delights in a tale of slander; another in an essay replete with pious instruction—one is in ecstacies at meeting with a violent political article; another eschews politics, and looks for romantic incidents or stories—one searches for scientific information, and another snaps at a humorous anecdote or conundrum—one is in raptures with a piece of poetry; another reads eagerly the account of the money market—one devours with eagerness whatever relates to war and military glory, while another reads with delight every paragraph illustrating the blessings of peace—one values a newspaper for its numerous list of deaths, another for its long array of marriages.—Boston Jour.

THE BOBALINKS HAVE COME.—Hear what the New Orleans Picayune says about them:

The rascals have an instinctive horror for cold lead, and a faculty of dodging out of its way which no other birds, so far as our ornithological knowledge extends, are possessed of. Frequently have we crept directly under a low ash or alder, upon the top of which one of the chatterers was perched, taking deliberate aim, our musket charged with about six inches of powder, and blazed away. Down the bird would come almost to the ground, and when we thought we had him secure, off he would fly. After performing divers fantastic gyrations, and flapping his wings to convince us we had not wounded nor hurt him, he would suddenly stop still in the air, perk knowingly and wickedly in our face, and in the joyousness of his exuberant fancy, would open with a song of his composition, the burthen of which sounded to us something like the following:

"Ha, ha, ha—don't you wish you could? Click bang! Wasn't I off in season? Hiti-ka-dink. Put in more powder. Chicadee, ke de. You had better shoot with a shovel. Ha, ha, ha. You can't come it. Didn't you think you had me? but you didn't though. Call again tomorrow, always find me at home, Chickadee—tip, wheat, never felt so well in all my life. Don't you feel cheap? Ha, ha, ha. Ripsidady. Catch a bobalink asleep. Zitikawheet. You are the greatest fool I ever saw. Licksa-tesplit! rattle-bang. Ha, ha, ha. Go to the deuce. Skeet!"

After indulging in this bit of extemporaneous raillery, and laughing all the while—we could fairly see him laugh—the bobalink would turn and fly off to the next bush, leaving us to load, creep up and bang away again or not, to suit our own fancy. Pert, saucy, noisy, witty fellows are these bobalinks—the Mercutios and Gossamers of the feathered tribe—but they never meddle with politics.

NEW TERRITORIES.—A bill to organize two new Northwestern Territories, designated as Nebraska and Minesota, is now before Congress. Some time since, the Toledo Blade furnished some interesting particulars in relation to Minesota.

Minesota is bounded on the North by Canada West; on the East by Michigan and Wisconsin; on the South by the parallel 43 deg. 30 min., which is the most Northern line of Iowa; and on the West by the River Sioux and Red River of the North. The line separating Minesota from Michigan, is in Lake Superior, and that separating it from Wisconsin, passes along Lake Superior to the falls of the St. Louis river, and thence South till it strikes the river St. Croix, which it follows to the Mississippi. Thence down the Mississippi to lat. 43½, the place of beginning.

Embraced within these boundaries there are about 90,000 square miles—equal to 58,000,000 of acres. It is in nearly the same latitude as the State of Maine. In area it exceeds the Island of Great Britain, and is nearly equal to France. Comparing it with old States—it is as large as New York and Pennsylvania. For the production of wheat and the grasses, its soil and climate are favorable. In commercial advantages, it will not be one of the most favored of the States, nor yet one of the least. By means of Lake Superior, on which it borders for more than 100 miles, from Pigeon river to Fond du Lac, its northern and middle portion will have cheap communication with all the Lake shores, and the Atlantic, and through the Upper Mississippi and St. Peters, will hold easy intercourse with the whole great valley below.

Lake Superior affords abundance of good harbors, and the Mississippi offers fine navigation up to the Falls of St. Anthony, more than 100 miles above the Southern boundary of Minesota.

With the exception of its Western portion, it is well watered by rivers and lakes. Its lake border is rich in metalliferous deposits.

The most important points in Minesota, at present, and probably for all time to come, are Fond du Lac, at the Western extremity of Lake Superior, and Fort Snelling, near the Falls of St. Anthony.

THE SIAMESE TWINS.—The Siamese twins are living in North Carolina as farmers, and both are married. A correspondent of the Richmond papers, who has recently visited their home, writes some interesting details in relation to their domestic life.

The twins can chop wood remarkably fast, four hands being on the axe at the same time. They also shoot at a mark or game with their four hands resting on the gun. They drive their horses 40 miles to Wilkes, themselves; and do any kind of work about the farm. Mrs. Eng says her husband is very kind to the negroes, and that Chang is very severe with them. Mrs. Eng is also better disposed than Mrs. Chang, although Mrs. Chang is the prettiest. Mrs. Eng is very close and saving; and Mrs. Chang is disposed to indulge in dress and various other expenses. The twins rarely differ about dress; but often differ in their ideas about purchasing negroes or land.—The opinion of Eng is always the law, and Chang readily acquiesces. Eng does all the writing, including the signing of notes and other important papers. Eng is one inch taller than Chang, and Chang's wife is taller than Eng's.

Some old lady in the neighborhood a few days ago asked Eng which was the oldest? and he replied that he was just six months older than his brother. Well, says the old lady, I thought there was about as much difference, for you are pretty considerable bigger than your brother. They are both good in a joke, and the old lady was in earnest. They have a blacksmith's shop on their farm, and a shoemaker's shop also. I saw a good sized frame house that they made, without any assistance; from foundation to roof. At the table they both use a bench, and each has his own knife and fork.

I asked them if they both expected to die at the same time? and they replied that it could not be otherwise; for if the same disease did not take them off at one time, the living one would have to be separated from the dead body, and the act of separation would be his death; but their general impression is that they will both die of the same disease, and at the same time. Their affection for each other is very strong. Any of the neighbors offering an insult to the one, the other immediately resents it; and it would take a champion to cope with them in a rough and tumble fight.—To use an expression of their neighbors, "they fight like cats."

INCIDENTAL ADVANTAGES OF RAILROADS.—Among the incidental advantages which may result from the opening of railroads into the interior, is the discovery of valuable kinds of stone and minerals. Thus in cutting through the hills of Canterbury, N. H., for the Concord and Montreal Railroad, the workmen have discovered soap stone of the very best quality, and apparently of considerable extent, which is of ready sale at $20 a ton. A correspondent in the Concord Congregational Journal, estimates the quarry at 2,000,000 cubic feet, or 166,666 tons; which, at $20 a ton, would amount to the snug little sum of $3,333,320.—Boston Traveller.

WHAT CAN BE EFFECTED BY GENIUS AND ELOQUENCE.—A year or two ago the meeting-house in Cranberry street, Brooklyn, was deserted, and sold at auction at about one-half its real value. It was the first presbyterian church built in Brooklyn, its day supposed to be done and it was looked upon as dead property. It was old fashioned and out of repair, it had neither painted windows nor a gothic steeple, and the pious and the fashionable alike neglected it. But the purchaser of it allowed the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, a young man from the West, full of strong impulses and vigorous Americanism to get into the pulpit, and an independent congregation was formed calling themselves the "Plymouth Church;" and people began to crowd to hear the new preacher, who was earnest in his manner and above the refined conventionalism of his order. He had thoughts in his mind and he uttered them without stopping to weigh their consequences, and the fame of his greatness spread and the once deserted church was again crowded with people anxious for something earnest, plain and comprehensible. The following statement from the Journal of Commerce tells the whole story of the result of Mr. Beecher's truthful and zealous preaching.—N. Y. Mirror.

GREAT PEW SALE.—The pews in the Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn, (the Rev. Mr. Beecher's,) were rented for one year on Monday evening. There are 150 pews on the main floor. Of these 99 were rented, and a part of the gallery, for the aggregate rent of $6,150 50. The remaining pews on the floor have been, or will be, all taken, and will produce about enough to raise the whole rent to $8,500. One gentleman took the whole gallery on one side, for the purpose of filling it with families who do not feel able to hire seats, or only at a very low price. He has 25 pews for $100, and intends to have a family for each of them. It is an excellent plan for doing good. This house was opened under the new arrangement just a year ago, without either a church or congregation.

INFLUENCE OF RELIGION.—In religion, the strong power of associations in opposition to the convictions of the understanding, is peculiarly worthy of notice, especially in the case of changes from a superstitious to a more rational and liberal creed. The force of a man's education has, perhaps, long held him in bondage, and his whole feelings have become interwoven with the tenets of his sect.—By the enlargement of his knowledge, however, he discovers his early opinions to be erroneous; different conclusions force themselves on his understanding, and his faith undergoes a radical alteration. Yet his former feelings still cling to his mind. A long time must often elapse before he can cast off the authority of his old prepossessions. It is not always that the mind can keep itself at a proper elevation for viewing such subjects in a clear light; and, till it has acquired the power of retaining its vantage ground, it may be reduced to its former state by the influence of vivid recollections, customary circumstances, general opinion, or any thing which may occasionally overpower its vigor or dim its perspicacity. Such men are re-plunged into their old prejudices, exactly in the same way as he, who has thrown off the superstitions of the nursery, is overpowered, as he passes through a church-yard at midnight, by his infantile associations.—Bailey.

"EARLY REMINISCENCES of WESTERN NEW-YORK AND THE LAKE REGION.—The address with this title, delivered by JAMES L. BARTON, Esq. before the Young Men's Association, on the 16th of last February, and from which we have already made copious extracts, has, by request of the Committee on Local History, been published in a beautiful pamphlet of sixty nine pages, by Jewett, Thomas & Co. It embodies a vast amount of important facts, which will be of great service to the future historian, and for the collection of which the author of the address is entitled to the grateful acknowledgements of his countrymen. It is concluded in these words:—

"I wished to call the minds of the rising population which is now filling up the country, to the contemplation of these astonishing facts:—That though between the years 1787 and 1847, we were engaged in a three years' war with England, and for seven other years, the whole North Western Territory was disrupted by the Indian difficulties in it, and which impeded the settlement of the country—yet, no more than sixty years have passed away, since the great country around these lakes, from the banks of the Seneca Lake to the Mississippi River, was an unbroken wilderness: That its whole population at that time did not exceed four thousand white inhabitants, without towns or farms, business or agriculture, and that the principal means of subsistence were a little corn and the game in the woods: That this same district of country now contains a vigorous, intelligent and enterprising population, but little if any less than sixty millions, with many large and beautiful cities, rising towns, richly cultivated farms, churches in every direction for the worship of God—colleges, academies, and other institutions of learning in large numbers.—manufactures and the arts in a flourishing condition, and the blessings and comforts of wealth surrounding us in the most profuse manner: That it is but fifty years since the first little vessel was built, that we ever had on these great lakes, which are now covered with the magnificent fleets of steam and sail vessels crowding our port to overflowing, bringing to and carrying away the productions of agriculture and the arts: That the rivers of the west leading from the same district of country, are filled with steam and other craft; and that the annual transit of property through these rivers and over our magnificent lakes, exceeds in value by many millions of dollars, the whole foreign commerce of the Union with all the nations of the world!

"Truly, we have cause to be proud of the land we live in, and of our glorious institutions which permit us to exercise to the fullest extent, the best faculties God has given to us—and a high duty falls upon us, continually to advance the prosperity of, and to be ever ready and willing to guard, preserve, and defend our inheritance."

WISCONSIN ELECTION.—NELSON DEWEY, the Democratic candidate for governor of Wisconsin, has been elected by about 5 or 6,000 majority.—The Democratic ticket generally prevailed.

THE DEMOCRATIC REVIEW for this month is embellished with a likeness of Gov. WILLIAM SMITH, of Va. engraved by T. DOSEY and accompanied by a biography of the same. In addition, it contains sixteen pages of a varied and interesting character, among which are, The United States Constitution, the Growth of the States, The East and West, and the influence of the Telegraph upon Literature. The drift and leading ideas of the last, is contained in the following extract:—

"The Telegraph is necessarily an expensive method of communication; yet it offers facilities which are indispensable to the man of business in this driving age of the world. Costly as it is, it must be employed. Now the desideratum of the Telegraph—the great question most important to all who have any connection with it, is this—How can the greatest amount of intelligence be communicated in the fewest words? Is not this the very question which has been for centuries theoretically proposed by scholars as the ultimatum of language? Language is but the medium of thought—which flies as rapidly and acts as instantaneously as the invisible element which flashes along the telegraphic wire. The more closely, then, that it follows the operation of thought, the more perfectly does it perform its office. Every useless ornament, every added grace which is not the very extreme of simplicity, is but a troublesome encumbrance.

Notice the operations of the mind in conversation. Observe how idea follows idea in such rapid succession, flitting so swiftly by that but few of them can be seized, and moulded into tangible form, even by the operation of that almost perfect instrument which the creator has given to us for communication with our fellows. How much of the freshness and beauty of even these imperfect impressions evaporates, in the slow and tedious process of committing them to writing. Especially is this the case where a vitiated public taste has introduced a style which wearies by its complicated and prolix verbosity, or one so affectedly brilliant and antithetical that it requires the most minute analysis and laborious study to resolve its meaning. Now the certain effect of the Telegraph, as far as it has any influence upon the language, (and who at the present day will dare to estimate its possible influence in the future,) will be to introduce a style of writing which shall be, first of all, brief. Brevity, it is said, is the soul of wit; it is indeed the soul of all language grave or gay, for every purpose, to which it can be applied, except caricature. We never yet heard that tediousness was the soul of anything in particular. The Telegraphic style, as we shall denominate it, for the benefit of all future writers upon rhetoric, is also terse, condensed, expressive, sparing of expletives and utterly ignorant of synonyms. From its subject matter it has little to do with beauty or grace; but the all important requisite in fine writing, perspicuity, cannot but be promoted by its prevalence. The first is a rare exotic, cultivated only in the gardens of the learned or the curious. The other is the hardy native plant, which is the very "staff of life" in the world of letters.

Let not the reader imagine that the influence of this invention is to be confined within the narrow precincts of the Telegraph office, or limited to the pen of the operator. When a half column or more of every paper in the Union is filled with telegraphic despatches; when these reports form a large part of the daily reading of thousands; when correspondence is hourly prepared and revised, throughout the whole extent of the United States, with a view to telegraphic transmission, is it too much to expect that this invention will have an influence upon American literature; and that that influence will be marked and permanent, and withal salutary? We can very easily imagine that in course of time the register may be so much improved that the price of transmission will be materially lessened, and the great reason for brevity and concentration of style partially removed—but this is a thing only probable, by no means certain; and it is quite as probable that a long time must elapse before the present imperfect apparatus will be superceded by a finished invention."

THE KNICKERBOCKER.—The editor of the Knickerbocker says of the number for this month, that he has tried to make it good; and although we have little more than devoured the contents of his table, we are inclined to think he has succeeded. Among other things, he congratulates Buffalo, "the great western end, as it were of this mighty metropolis," on receiving to its corps editorial a "valuable accession" in the person of WM. A. SEAVER, Esq., editor of the Courier. He says:—

"We have known Mr. SEAVER long and well; and we have great pleasure in adding our cordial testimony to that alike of his political friends and opponents, in favor of his talents as a writer, his judgment as editor, and his character as a man and a gentleman."

From the same department is also selected the following scrap on the dandy:

"We never see one of the genus dandy stepping mincingly down Broadway, on a pleasant sunny day, without thinking how little such a biped knows of, or contributes to, what is going on in the great land which he cumbers by his idle, aimless life. The busy hum of cities; the granite mountain, melting into light dust before the patient toilers on a hundred rail-roads; furnaces, with their 'stygian fire throats' vomiting forth flame, while the melting oar is running into countless forms for man's use—of all these what knows or what thinks he? 'He is a dandy!'"

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW for March, republished by Leonard Scott & Co., New-York, has been received by A. Burke, under the Mansion House. Its papers are, Antiquarian Club Books, Scotch Topography and Statistics, Eastlake on the History of Painting, Tennyson's Princess, Our Military Establishments, Count Montholon and Sir Hudson Howe, Lord Hervey's Memoirs, and the French Revolution. We shall refer to some of these papers more particularly hereafter.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW for April has appeared, and shall receive early attention. Its pages look inviting. It is for sale by Andrew Burke, the regularly authorized agent of L. Scott & Co.

"GRACE GREENWOOD."—The Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post of the 13th instant, copies an article from Mrs. Joseph C. Neal's Saturday Gazette, divulging the secret that the real name of Grace Greenwood, is, as we publicly announced a year or two ago, Miss SARAH J. CLARKE.

EDWIN FORREST, the tragedian, has taken a final leave of the stage and gone to farming. "I wish," says he in his farewell address, "to withdraw from the laborious toils of the profession, while yet in the possession of an unimpaired constitution; before age has debilitated or time has shaken my faculties; for, I would not like the worn veteran, 'lag superfluous on the stage.'—Beside, I wish to engage in another pursuit; one more congenial to my present taste; a pursuit which has been rightly characterized by Washington, as the most healthful, the most useful and the most noble employment of man—the cultivation of the soil."

Mr. F. has shown himself in this act, a very sensible man.

The Fire at Detroit.

From the Detroit Daily Advertiser Extra.

DETROIT, May 10, 1848.

A large portion of the "City of the Straits" is this moment a smoking mass of ruins! Detroit was yesterday visited with the most destructive conflagration yet known in its history. A fire broke out about ½ after 11 o'clock in the morning, in the large yellow warehouse, between Randolph and Bates streets, and did not cease its ravages until, at the least calculations, between eighty and one hundred buildings were laid in ashes, including two or three large warehouses on the river, the Steamboat Hotel, Wales's Hotel, and a number of the pleasant private residences on Jefferson avenue. The district burned, includes some half dozen blocks.

The fire originated from the sparks of the Propeller St. Joseph, which was lying at the wharf in front of the Warehouse. The Warehouse itself was unoccupied, and when the fire was discovered it could not be got at until it had made considerable progress. The building was an old one, all wood, and being as dry as tinder, the flames spread with frightful rapidity.

The wind blew a fresh gale from the southwest, spreading the flames with maddening fury over a district of several acres, thickly dotted with buildings. Within a few moments the adjoining buildings, including the Indiana Hotel and the large Ware House of Messrs. DeWolf & McFarland were destroyed. All the efforts of our energetic Firemen proved unavailing, the flames spreading at a rapid pace along Randolph St. towards Jefferson Avenue until it reached and crossed Woodbridge St., Sweeping away Berthelet Market and the entire block on both sides of Randolph St., following up Atwater to Brush St.

The wind continued to blow with increased fury, and in a few moments afterwards the Steamboat Hotel was a mass of flames. The fate of the splendid Wales' Hotel buildings and the dwellings above, on the Avenue, now became evident.—The heat was intense, driving the firemen and citizens from its ravaging course. A few moments and Wales' Hotel was wrapt in the devouring elements, presenting a scene of terrific grandeur. The fire continued its course up the Avenue, crossing Brush street, and was only arrested in its course two buildings before it reached the Congregational Church, which at one time, was in imminent danger.

From the Steamboat Hotel, the flames passed across the alley, and communicated with the large brick block in which the Daily Advertiser office is located—and soon black volumes of smoke and terrific flames were bursting from the windows. Everything in the large block was tumbled, in sad confusion, into the streets—including all the materials of our office, our heavy printing presses, &c., &c.

The block was divided by entire walls, from cellar to roof, which saved it from utter ruin.—The roof and upper stories, between several of the partitions, were destroyed. The total loss by this terrible conflagration, we can, of course, form no correct estimate of at present: it is very great, some estimating it as high as $300,000. The number of buildings destroyed was probably between 200 and 300, and near one thousand persons were turned into the streets.

Several acres of the city, which yesterday morning was thickly dotted with buildings, and alive with activity, this morning can only be seen a forest of chimneys. of tattered and falling walls, and heaps of smoking ruins.

We have not been able to learn definitely the amount of insurances. Wales' Hotel buildings were insured in the N. Western Co. for $3000.—We understand there was no insurance on the Steamboat Hotel. Messrs. Barker & Bryan, tobacconists, in the same block with us, lost their whole stock, of some $5000, without insurance.—We have no time now to give farther details. The firemen displayed the utmost energy throughout the exciting scene. The fire raged from about 11 A. M. to 3 P. M. Several citizens were more or less injured in the general scramble, and we hear that one person was burned to death—being intoxicated, and asleep in one of the buildings near the Berthelet Market.

Under the afflicting circumstances in which we participate with thousands of our neighbors, we have to ask the kind indulgence of our patrons and readers for one or two days, when we hope again to be before them in our usual form. To those of our friends who so kindly volunteered in rescuing our property, and especially to our neighbors of the Free Press Office, and Mr. Munger, we tender our unfeigned thanks.

The Free Press puts down the number of buildings destroyed at 300, the number of families rendered houseless at from 300 to 400, and the loss of property, at a low estimate, at from $200,000 to $300,000. No such calamity has ever before fallen upon Detroit, and her sufferings appeal loudly to the sympathies of her neighbors. The Mayor of Detroit has called a public meeting for the relief of the sufferers.

Steam Communication Between New York and the West Indies.—Early this morning, the steamer Great Western, the old New York favorite, under command of Capt. Chapman, came into port, in 78 hours from Bermuda, agreeably to the recent arrangement of the British West India Mail Steam Packet Company, who have determined to include New York and Bermuda, now within their circuit. Monthly steam communication will now be had between this port and Bermuda.

New York has thus become the focus of Atlantic Steam Navigation, from which will radiate, in a short time, steamers to and from all parts of the known world.—N. Y. Express.

Guatemala.—A treaty has been entered into between Great Britain and Guatemala. It was signed on the 22d of February.

Arrival of the Cambria.

The steamer Cambria arrived at New York Sunday morning from Diverpool, whence she sailed on the 29th ult.

Matters in Ireland continues as before. The people arming, talking and printing rebellion.—The government are taking strong measures to subdue outbreaks. Fearful accounts are received of destitution of provisions. There is a rumor that Dublin would be proclaimed and placed under the late act for the search of arms. All the blacksmiths in Dublin are busy making pikes. Rifle drilling was to be put down.

Another quarrel between Lamartine and Ledru Rollin threatening to overturn the government.

The bullion had diminished in the bank of England. Considerable sums had been sent to France, and Holland, and also to Ireland, to meet any run on the Savings banks.

The advices from the English manufacturing districts are more favorable than at last advices.—Considerable business had been done in Manchester, but at lower rates. There is not much improvement in prospect, and the spinners and manufacturers are heavy losers, notwithstanding the cheapness of the raw material.

All kinds of breadstuffs are in good demand, and prices appear inclined to a slight improvement.

It is said that Lamartine has concluded a treaty with Switzerland, the Italian States, and that portion of Germany represented in the Diet of Frankfort.

The Milan Gazette, not a bad authority on such a point, although very little to be relied upon, respecting the real incidents of the war, hints now that the Mincio is the limit separating Lombardy from the Venetian provinces, and that having driven the Austrians out of Lombardy, the mission of the Sardinian envoy, and of the king, would terminate when Peschiera and Mantua have fallen.

The news of the intention of the King of Sardinia to abandon the war of independence, rather than consent to the establishment of a republic in Lombardy, is confirmed.

Naples, Palermo, and Messina are quiet. The King of Naples has unwillingly sent troops to Charles Albert.

The disturbances in Rome have been put down. The Bank of Rome has suspended. Its notes have been made a lawful tender.

In Lombardy, the army of Charles Albert after having been repulsed at Peschiera, continues to maintain its position on the banks of the Minicio.

Skirmishes had taken place in which the Austrians were victorious, taking possession of Previno, Valvasano and Condroit. The fortunes of Charles Albert appear to have received a check.

In Sicily—House of Commons have decreed Ferdinand, Bourbon, and his dynasty forever fallen from the throne of Sicily.

The Limerick Examiner says: "There are at present 100 spies in the Lying-in-Hospital, Boherbuoy, and about 70 in the police barrack. They are daily seen prowling about the streets; the people should beware of them, lest they may entrap innocent persons. It is, we understand, the intention of government to freight a ship and send them to America. The country will have a happy riddance of them, at any cost. We cannot, however, prospectively congratulate America on the immigration of the vagabond wretches."

Rathkeale.—The people here attend pike practice every evening. Plans of pikes are posted up for the instruction of country smiths. The police, being strong mustered, in some instances made gallant captures of the paper pikes.

DUBLIN.—The Warder states that pikes are to be purchased openly of a man named Flanigan, 32 Charles st. where they are publicly sold.

At Hyland's, the smith pikemaker, by appointment to the Castle, pikes are sold at from 2 to 10s.

LIMERICK.—The Limerick Examiner states that not 1000 miles off, 9000 men are nightly engaged in pike exercise. A coffin was brought into town, filled with firearms.

The same paper states that the rifle clubs are engaged in sharp practice here. The targets, a rude sketch of Lord Clarendon.

CORK.—From Youghal to Mallow, from Coppoquin to Clonmel, nothing is spoken of but rifle clubs and pikes. At a rifle club at Clay Castle, over 2,000 persons were present.

The European Times of the 29th says:—Whilst we are writing, the intelligence reaches us that the Crown has entered a nolle prosequi to the bills found against Mitchell, by the grand jury, and has, proceeded by ex officio information, charging him with the same publications as those charged by the grand jury.

The same procedure has taken place with regard to Messrs O'Brien and Meagher. It is also rumored that the privy council has ordered the city of Dublin to be proclaimed and an immediate search made for arms. It however, wants, confirmation.

Trouble was feared among the Chartists in Scotland and in the North of England.

After the extraordinary excitement in the Parisian capital, incidental to the prodigious display of troops and national guards which took place last week, our neighbors have subsided into a calm.—No fewer than 40,000 armed men assisted at the recent great spectacle of national fraternization; and this determination, with the introduction of a considerable body of the troops of the line into the capital, have concurred in maintaining tranquility. The Provisional Government did not fail to seize this grand opportunity once more, by means of a public proclamation addressed to the people, to the national guards, and to the army, to enforce its opinions. It declared that "order was guaranteed; the security and independence of the national representation secured;" and gave the assurance that "family and private property are sacred; industry is free; credit revives; specie, buried by distrust, re-appears; labor, the property of the operative, is created by government, surrounded by institutions protective of the rights of the poorest and the weakest. Fraternity will not be a mere ceremony; it will be the law." How far these declarations are in accordance with the passing occurrences, our readers can determine.

On Sunday the great events of the elections immediately followed the spectacle of the Thursday previous; and fortunately, all the apprehensions entertained of great disturbances during the progress of this formality have been falsified. The voters have performed their duties in Paris without any interruption of the public peace; indeed, the quietness which prevails, and the paucity of the actual voters, compared with the number of real electors, would argue an indifference of public spirit rather then any vehement degree of patriotism, one way or the other. As the returns would only be complete on Friday, in Paris, we shall have scarcely time to form a deliberate opinion of the general result of the election, upon which depends the future happiness of France and the general peace of the world. In the meantime, great complaints are made of the open bribery and corruption inseparable from universal suffrage.

Stringent endeavors have been made by the authorities to prevent an abuse of the elective franchise: but as many voters have each procured, with apparent facility, no fewer than seven or eight tickets, entitling them to vote as many times, and as the provisional government is charged with using secretly undue influence through the army, and Louis Blanc and Albert through their personal ouvriers unemployed, the purity of election is not altogether immaculate or free from suspicion. The Provisional Government continues its most extraordinary system of arbitrary decrees.

The provisional government has also passed a decree definitely abolishing slavery in all the colonies and possessions of the French Republic. The decree is to take effect two months after its publication, in the colonies. An indemnity is to be granted to the slave owners, the amount and form of which is to be fixed by the national assembly. All traffic in slaves is to be interdicted between proprietors from the date of the publication of the decree, and measures to be taken to prevent the introduction of free laborers from Senegal, as at present contemplated by England from the western coast of Africa.

On Wednesday Mr. Richard Rush, the Minister of the United States in Paris, waited on M. Lamartine at the Hotel de Ville, and formally recognized the French Republic in the name of the American Union.

The French army now comprises 537,000 men, and has greatly increased since the revolution. In the provinces great discontent prevails, and the schemes of the ultras to overthrow the government still caused apprehension in Paris. A plot to blow up the Hotel de Ville, and to make the Republic more democratic than is meditated by the provisional government, has been detected, and a judicial inquiry is now in progress into the alleged conspiracy, which, it is said, will comprise some persons in high station. The National Guards would doubtless preserve order should any such horrible scheme be anticipated.

The Paris papers of the 28th ult., confirm our previous report that the eight moderate members of the provisional government will be at the top of the list of the thirty-four deputies elected for Paris, while the four members of a more violent tendency, will be nearly at the bottom of it.

The elections in the departments were, on the whole, of a similar character.

These facts suggested fears that the ultra-republicans might make an attempt to dissolve the Chamber by force, but up to the moment when our despatch left Paris, everything was tranquil. The government was, however, fully prepared to meet any danger that might present itself.

Another account says that the election returns, from the sections as well as from the departments, continue to be most satisfactory to those who desire to see the moderate party, represented in the Provisional government by M. Lamartine, prevail.—In almost every arrondissement in Paris M. Lamartine and the moderate party in the government head the lists, and throughout the departments the commissaries of M. Ledru Rollin are at a great discount. The intelligence had produced a very sensible improvement in the money market. It was reported that M. Albert had gone over from M. Rollin's to Lamartine's party in the Cabinet, and that M. Ledru Rollin was only waiting for the meeting of the National Assembly to resign his post as Minister without waiting for a dismissal.

Accounts from Prussia were not favorable to the maintenance of tranquility. Riots had taken place at Breslau, and 30 or 40 persons were killed or wounded.

The approaching elections were not expected to pass off peaceably.

Austria appears to be honorably acting up to the terms dictated by the Revolutionists.

In Vienna tranquility prevailed.

The accounts from Baden are most deplorable. The insurgents had intimated that they wished to capitulate to the force sent against them, but would treat with none but the General in command. Lieut. General Gagern advanced from Schligen, which they occupied, and General stept from the ranks to parley with the rebels.—It must be remembered that Gen. Gagern was the leader in the movement for reform in Germany and the prime mover of the Preparatory Assembly at Frankfort.

Advices from Berne to the 17th have been received. The Diet had a secret sitting on the 14th upon the demand of the King of Sardinia, that the Swiss confederation should mach 30,000 men into Lombardy, and keep a reserve of 20,000 on the frontier. A committee was appointed on this, whose report was expected to be present on the 17th. At the date of the last accounts this report had not been present.

In Spain matters seem fast progressing towards an outbreak. The utter absence of all constitutional government must soon provoke the people to rebellion, however attached they may be to their present forms of government. Lord Palmerston has addressed a letter to the Spanish Ministry, in which, with the reply of the Duke of Sotomayor, it is seen that his advice gave such umbrage to the Narvaez Cabinet, that the Duke of Sotomayor sent the letter back to Mr. Bulwer, with strong expressions of rudeness and contempt; and there can be no doubt that every intrigue has been set on foot to remove Mr. Bulwer from his post at Madrid.

According to the last accounts from Lisbon, which are of the 19th, Portugal seems to be on the eve of some serious movement. Publications have been extensively circulated, in which are openly canvassed "the abdication of the Queen in favor of her son; a new dynasty, entirely new; and even a republic." The latter form of government, after discussing the question in very inflammatory language, is declared to be the best, and that the nation desires it. When such language as this is held in monarchical Portugal, it portends something ominous. The finances appear to be in a most wretched state.

Important Inventions.—Mr. David Isham, a machinist of Hartford, Conn., has recently invented a process by which cast iron can be converted, almost instantly, and with but slight expense and labor, into steel. Twenty minutes only is necessary to convert a ton of iron into steel of the best quality, a process ordinarily requiring from six to ten days. The inventor has been offered $12,000 for the patent right for the State of Pennsylvania alone. Articles manufactured from steel thus prepared, have been proved and found equal to those manufactured from the best English steel. If this invention is really what it purports to be, it will destroy one great branch of English labor and add much to the wealth of this country.

The Rev. Mr. Pepper, a Presbyterian clergyman of Albany, N. Y., has invented a compound of clay, called Argillo, which resembles in structure and appearance, the richest, variegated agates. It is to be used for door knobs, pavements, table tops, and other ornamental articles. It surpasses in brilliancy any known variety of marble, and is equally cheap. The Hartford Whig speaks of it in the following terms: "No one, who has not seen it, can form an idea of its beauty and illimitable variety of color. It is so hard as to resist any scratch except that of a crystal or diamond. Already, Mr. Calhoun has introduced in the Senate a resolution, which passed instantly, to the effect, that all the floors of the public offices in the Capital should be made of this beautiful material. $1,000,000 has been offered for the entire patent."—Springfield Rep.

Later from the City of Mexico.

Petersburgh, May 10, 1848.

Advices from New Orleans to the 4th instant have been received by special overland express.

The steamship Fashion, from Brazos Santiago, had arrived. Among the passengers was J. L. Collins, of New York city, who bears despatches from Gens. Price and Wool, to Washington. He states that about the 6th of March, a Mexican lieutenant sent word that a small party had been captured near El Passo.

This, with information that Gen. Urrea had designs upon that post, induced Gen. Price to proceed to its relief But finding on his arrival there, that no such danger was to be apprehended, he determined to advance upon Santa Cruz, where government trains, with about 1500 or 2000 troops were stationed.

Gen. Trias, the Mexican chief, having fortified the place, awaited the attack. After a fruitless parley of eight days, Gen. Price assaulted, and although a gallant resistance was made, succeeded in taking the place, and captured fourteen pieces of artillery, two thousand stands of arms and some $800,000 worth of public property.

On the 18th, Gen. Price proceeded with part of his force to Chihuahua, leaving Lieut. Col. Ralls in command of the remainder, with orders to follow as soon as practicable.

Gen. Trias, forty of his officers and his troops were paroled.

The Mexican loss was one hundred and fifty killed and as many more wounded. Our loss was five killed and twenty wounded, of whom two have since died.

The schooner Heroine arrived from Vera Cruz on the 3d instant.

No quorum of the Congress at Queretaro, had yet been got together. Sixteen deputies and four senators were still wanting for the transaction of business. The members of the Congress who had arrived, expressed themselves as being very favorably disposed for peace.

The trial of Capts. Hare, Dutton and the other persons accused of the late murder and attempt at burglary, is still going on.

Fifteen or twenty American deserters enlisted recently in the Mexican army.

India Rubber is now proposed to insulate Telegraphic wires. Gutta percha has been tried in the Passaic river, with so much success, that the company propose to make an effort to cross from Jersey City to New York by laying insulated wires under water. Mr. Wilson of the Trenton Telegraph office has suggested to the company, according to the Gazette, the experiment of insulating their whole line with gutta percha, and burying it six inches in the ground instead of supporting it as now upon poles. At present, the great exposure of the wires, subjects them to innumerable and constant interruptions.—Newark Adv,

Off the Track and Struck with Lightning.—We understand that on Sunday morning one of the engines on the Harlem Railroad ran off the track, near White Plains, and against the telegraph pole, at the same time breaking the wire, which remained on the engine which connected with the cars. At the same time a flash of lightning was conducted to the cars, giving the passengers a severe shock. No injury was done, however, except breaking the engine and slightly hurting the engineer and fireman.—Cour. & Enq.

Look at the Bright Side.

Look at the bright side! The sun's golden rays
All nature illumine, and the heart of man cheereth;
Why will thou turn so perversely to gaze
On that dark cloud which now in the distance appeareth?

Look at the bright side! Recount all thy joys;
Speak of the mercies which richly surround thee,
Muse not forever on that which annoys:
Shut not thine eyes to the beauties around thee.

Look at the bright side! Mankind, it is true,
Have their failings, nor should they be spoken of lightly;
But why on their faults concentrate thy view,
Forgetting their virtues which shine forth so brightly?

Look at the bright side! And it shall impart
Sweet peace, and contentment, and grateful emotion,
Reflecting its own brilliant lines on thy heart,
As the sunbeams that mirror themselves in the ocean.

Look at the bright side! Nor yield to despair:
If some friends forsake, yet others still love thee;
And when the world seems mournful colors to wear,
Oh look from the dark earth to heaven above thee.

From California and Oregon.

In the Oregon Spectator of the 19th of August the editor announces that he has information that there are nearly two thousand wagons on the route from the United States, all of which, with the exception of 400 Mormon wagons, are bound for Oregon, and adds, we think this rather a large estimate. One thousand wagons will do for this year.

The wheat crop for '47 will not fall anything below that of 1846, which was about 150,000 bushels.

Mr. Reeves, the pilot, has discovered a new and excellent channel at the mouth of the Columbia river.

The Spectator of the 14th of October contains a petition to Congress praying that body to extend its jurisdiction over Oregon.

There was a meeting of Delegates held at the Falls of the Yamhill river, October 2, for the purpose of recommending to the President of the United States suitable persons to fill the various offices that will be created upon the passage of the bill establishing a Territorial Government of Oregon. The meeting broke up a sort of a row, and the editor of the Spectator pokes a deal of fun at the whole proceeding.

Of the emigration, we learn of the safe arrival of six hundred wagons to the valleys of the Oregon, while we are credibly informed of the manifest anxiety for the welfare of the remainder, as it must be understood, one-half only of the emigration is enumerated above. Details of suffering reached the settlements even previous to the sailing of the Whiton, and if unexaggerated, there is much worse to apprehend. An immense body, from the setting in and severity of the rains, were detained among the Cascade Mountains, and excessive want and misery ensued.

It is said that President Polk has restored Midshipman Pollock, who was sentenced to State Prison for shooting an editor in Buffalo, N. Y., to his rank in the Navy. He had been previously pardoned from prison by Governor Young.—Jour. of Com.

Forgiveness.

I strolled among the green mounds of the village burial place when I was reminded how all human love and hate find one sad level—and how, sooner or later, wronged and wrong-doer, each with meekened face and cold hands folded over a still heart, pass the green threshold of a common grave. Awed for myself and pitying my race, our common sorrow like a mighty wave, swept all my pride away, and, trembling, I forgave.—J. G. Whittier.

Disheartened and sighing, I turned with disdain,
From the world which with coldness had wounded my trust,
And pouring my soul out in sorrow's refrain,
I strayed where my fellows were sleeping in dust.

Of the wrongs of feigned friendship I soberly thought,
And whispered the names of my bitterest foes;
But musing where all to a level are brought,
Where wronged and wrong-doer together repose;

And thinking how soon the green sod might be turned
For myself and my foes in the same clayey bed,
The fires of revenge in my bosom that burned,
Soon died like a spark by the zephyrs unfed.

Since with those we have met in the battle of life,
Ere long, side by side, at His bar we must stand,
Where the wrongs we have suffered in folly's mad strife,
Will be dealt with in justice at Mercy's own hand;

Let us study the lesson, 'tis sweet to forgive,
And, at peace with mankind and with Him who is "love,"
On earth we may hope for His glory to live,
And look for forgiveness when summoned above.

The Power of Love.

BY L. MARIA CHILD.

It was one of Ireland's greenest lanes that wound its way down to a rippling brook in the rear of Friend Goodman's House. And there, by a mound of rocks that dipped their mossy feet in the rivulet, Friend Goodman walked slowly, watching for his little daughter, who had been spending the day with some children in the neighborhood. Presently, the small maiden came jumping along, with her bonnet thrown back, and the edges of her soft brown ringlets luminous in the rays of the setting sun. Those pretty curls were not Quakerly; but Nature, who pays more attention to the regulations of Elders, than she does to the edicts of Bishops, would have it so. At the slightest breath of moisture, the silky hair rolled into spirals, and clustered her pure white forehead, as if it loved the nestling place. Jumping, likewise, was not a Quakerly proceeding. But little Alice, usually staid and demure, in imitation of those around her had met with a new companion, whose temperament was more mercurial than her own, and she was yielding to its magnetic influence.

Camillo Campbell, a boy of six years, was the grandson of an Italian lady who had married an Irish absentee, resident in Florence. Her descendants had lately come to Ireland, and taken possession of estates in the immediate neighborhood of Friend Goodman, where little Camillo's foreign complexion, lively temperament, and graceful broken language, rendered him an object of great interest, especially among children. He it was with whom little Alice was skipping thro' the green lane, bright and free as the wind and sunshine that played among her curls. As the sober father watched their innocent gambols, he felt his own pulses quicken, and his motions involuntary became more rapid and elastic than usual. The little girl came nestling up to his side, and rubbed her head upon his arm, like a petted kitten. Camillo peeped roguishly from behind the mossy rocks, kissed his hand to her, and ran off, hopping first on one foot and then on the other.

"Dost thou like that little boy?" inquired Friend Goodman as he stooped to kiss his darling.

"Yes, Camillo's a pretty boy, I like him," she replied. Then with a skip and a bound, which showed that the electric fluid was still leaping in her veins, she added "he's a funny boy, too; he swears you all the time."

The simple child, being always accustomed to hear thee and thou, verily thought you was a profane word. Her father did what was very unusual with him: he laughed outright, as he replied, "what a strange boy is that!"

"He asked me to come down to the rock and play to-morrow. May I go after school?" she asked.

"We will see what mother says," he replied. "But where didst thou meet Camillo?"

"He came to play with us in the lane, and Deborah and John and I went into his garden to see the birds. Oh, he has got such pretty birds!—There's a nice little meeting-house in the garden; and there's a woman standing there with a baby. Camillo calls her my donny. He says we mustn't [illegible]re. Why not? Who is my donny?"

"The people in Italy, where Camillo used to live, call the mother of Christ Madonna." replied her father.

"And who is Christ?" she asked.

"He was a holy man, who lived a great many years ago. I read to thee one day about his taking little children in his arms and blessing them."

"I guess he loved little children almost as well as thou," said Alice. "But what do they put his mother in that little meeting-house for?"

Not deeming it wise to puzzle her busy little brain with theological explanations, Friend Goodman called her attention to a small dog, whose curly white hair soon displaced the Madonna, and even Camillo, in her thoughts. But the new neighbor, and the conservatory peopled with birds, and the little chapel in the garden, made a strong impression on her mind. She was always talking of them, and in after years they remained by far the most vivid picture in the gallery of childish recollections. Nearly every day, she and Camillo met at the mossy rock, where they planted flowers and buried flies in clover-leaves, and launched little boats on the stream. When they strolled toward the conservatory, the old gardener was always glad to admit them. Flowering shrubs and gaudy parrots, so bright in the warm sunshine, formed so cheerful a contrast to her own unadorned home, that little Alice was never weary with gazing and wondering. But from all the brilliant things she chose two Java sparrows for her special favorites. The old gardener told her they were Quaker birds, because their feathers were all of such a soft, quiet color. Bright little Camillo caught up the idea, and said "I know what for you so much do like them: Quaker lady-birds they be."

"And she's a Quaker lady-bird, too," said the old gardener, smiling, as he patted her on the head; "she's a nice little lady-bird." Poll Parrot heard him, and repeated "Lady bird." Always, after that when Alice entered the conservatory, the parrot laughed and screamed "Lady-bird."

Near the door were two niches partially concealed by a net-work of vines; and in the niches were statues of two winged children. Alice inquired who they were; and Camillo replied.— "My little sister and brother. Children of the Madonna now they is." His mother had told him this, and he did not understand what it meant: neither did Alice. She looked up at the winged ones with timid love, and said, "Why dont they come down and play with us?"

"From Heaven they cannot come down," answered Camillo.

Alice was about to inquire the reason why, when the parrot interrupted her by calling out, "Lady-bird!" and Camillo began to mock her — Then, laughing merrily, off they ran to the mossy rock to plant some flower the gardener had given them.

That night, while Alice was eating her supper, Friend Goodman chanced to read aloud something in which the word heaven occurred. "I've been to heaven," said Alice.

"Hush, hush, my child," replied her father.

"But I have been to heaven," she insisted.— "Little children have wings there."

Her parents exchanged glances of surprise, and the mother asked "how dost thou know that little children have wings in heaven?"

"Because I saw them," she replied. "They wear white gowns, and they are the children of my donny. My donny lives in the little meeting-house in Camillo's garden. She's the mother of Christ that loved little children so much; but she never said anything to me. The birds call me lady bird in heaven."

Her mother looked very sober. "She gets her head full of strange things down there yonder," said she. "I tell thee, Joseph, I don't like to have the children playing together so much. There's no telling what may come of it."

"Oh, they are mere babes," replied Joseph.— "The my donny, as she calls it, and her doll, are all the same to her. The children take a deal of comfort together, and it seems to me it is not worth while to put enstrangement between them. Divisions come fast enough in the human family.— When he is a lad, he will go away to school and college, and will come back to live in a totally different world from ours. Let the little ones enjoy themselves while they can."

Thus spoke the large-hearted Friend Joseph; but Rachel was not so easily satisfied. "I don't like this talk about graven images," said she. "If the child's head gets full of such notions, it may not prove so easy to put them out."

Truly, there seemed some ground for Rachel's fears; for whether Alice waked or slept, she seemed to live in the neighbor's garden. Sitting beside her mother, in the silent Quaker meeting, she forgot the row of plain bonnets before her, and saw a vision of winged children through a veil of vines. At school, she heard the old green parrot scream, Lady-bird! and fan-tailed doves and Java sparrows hopped in her dreams. She had never heard a fairy story in her life; otherwise, she would doubtless have imagined that Camillo was a prince. who lived in an enchanted palace, and had some fairy for a friend.

It came to pass as Joseph had predicted.— These days of happy companionship soon passed away, Camillo went to a distant school, then to college, and then was absent for a while on the continent. It naturally happened that the wealthy Catholic family had but little intercourse with the substantial Quaker farmer. Years passed without a word between Alice and her former playfellow. Once, during his college life, she met him and his father on horseback, as she was riding home from meeting, on a small grey mare her father had given her. He touched his hat and said "How do you do, Miss Goodman?" and she replied, "How art thou Camillo?" His father inquired, "Who is that young lady?" and he answered, "She is the daughter of Farmer Goodman, with whom I used to play sometimes when I was a little boy." Thus like shadows they passed on their separate ways. He thought no more of the rustic Quaker girl, and with her the bright picture of their childhood was like the remembrance of last year's rainbow.

But events now approached, which put all rainbows and flowers to flight. A Rebellion broke out in Ireland, and a terrible civil war began to rage between Catholics under the name of Pikemen, and Protestants under the name of Orangemen. The Quakers, being conscientiously opposed to war, could not adopt the emblems of either party, and were of course exposed to the hostility of both. Joseph Goodman, in common with others of his religious persuasion, had always professed to believe, that returning good for evil was a heavenly principle and therefore safe policy. Alice had received this belief as a traditionary inheritance, without disputing it, or reflecting upon it. But now came times that tested faith severely. Every night they retired to rest with the consciousness that their worldly possessions might be destroyed by fire and pillage before morning, and perhaps their lives sacrificed by infuriated soldiers. At the meeting-house, and by the way side, earnest were the exhortations of the brethren to stand by their principles, and not flinch in this hour of trial. Joseph Goodman's sermon was brief and impressive. "The Gospel of Love has power to regenerate the world," said he; "and the humblest individual, who lives according to it, has done something for the salvation of man."

His strength was soon tried; for the very next day a party of Pikemen came into the neighborhood and set fire to all the houses of the Orangemen. Groans and shrieks, and the sharp sound of shots were heard in every direction. Fierce men rushed into their peaceful dwelling, demanding food, and ordering them to give up their arms.

"Food I will give, but arms I have none!" replied Joseph.

"More shame for you!" roared the commander of the troop. "If you can't do anything more for your country than that, you may as well be killed at once for a coward, as you are."

He drew his sword, but Joseph did not wink at the flash of the glittering blade. He looked him calmly in the eye and said, 'If thou art willing to take the crime of murder on thy conscience, I cannot help it. I would not willingly do harm to thee, or to any man."

The the soldier turned away abashed, and putting his sword into the scabbard he muttered— "Well, give us something to eat, will you?"

The hours that followed were frightful with the light of blazing houses, the crash of musketry, and the screams of women and children flying across the fields. Many took refuge in the house of Joseph, and he did all he could to sothe them.

At sunset, he went forth with his serving men to seek the wounded and dead. Along the road and among the bushes, mangled bodies were lying in every direction. Those in whom life remained, they brought with all tenderness and consigned to the care of Rachel and Alice; and as long as they could see, they gathered the dead for burial. In the evening, the captain of the Pikemen returned to Joseph in great wrath.

"This is rather too much," he exclaimed; "we don't spare your house this morning to have it converted into a hospital for the damned Orangemen. Turn out every dog of them, or we will burn it down over their heads."

"I cannot stay thy hand, if thou hast the heart to do it," mildly replied Joseph, "but I will not desert my fellow creatures in their great distress. If the time should come when thy party is routed, we will bury thy dead, and nurse thy wounded, as we have done for the Orangemen. I will do good to all parties and harm to none. Here I take my stand, and thou mayest kill me if thou will."

Again the soldier was arrested by a power he knew not how to resist. Joseph, seeing his embarrassment, added,

"I put the question to thee as a man of war: Is it manly to persecute women and children? Is it brave to torture the wounded and dying? Wouldst thou feel easy to think of it in thy dying hour? Let us part in peace, and when thou hast need of a friend, come to me."

After a brief hesitation, the soldier said, "It would be a happier world if all thought as you do." Then calling to his men, he said, "Let us be off, boys; there's nothing to be done here."

A fortnight after, triumphant Orangemen came with loud uproar to destroy the houses of the Pikemen. It was scarcely day-break when Alice was roused from uneasy slumbers by the discharge of musketry, and a lurid light on the walls of her room. Starting up, she beheld Col. Campbell's house in a blaze. The beautiful statutes of the Madonna, and the winged children were knocked to pieces and ground under the feet of the angry mob. Vines and flowers crisped under the crackling flames, and the beautiful birds from foreign climes fell suffocated in the smoke, or flew forth, frightened into the woods and fields, and perished by cruel hands. In the green lane, once so peaceful and pleasant, ferocious men were scuffling and trampling, shooting and stabbing. Everywhere the grass and moss were dabbled with blood.—Above all the din, were heard the shrill screams of women and children; and the mother of Camillo came flying into Joseph's house, exclaiming, "Hide me, oh! hide me!' Alice received her in her arms, laid the throbbing heart tenderly on her bosom, put back her hair that was fallling in wild disorder over her face, and tried to calm her terror with gentle words. Others came pouring in, and no one was refused shelter, To the women of Col. Campbell's household. Alice reliquished her little bed-room—the only corner of the house that was not already filled to overflowing. She drew the curtain, that the afflicted ones need not witness the bloody skermishing in the fields and lane below. But a loud shriek soon recalled her to their side. Mary Campbell had withdrawn the curtain, and seen her husband fall, thrust by a dozen swords. Fainting-fits and hysterics succeeded each other in quick succession. while Alice and her mother laid her on the bed, and rubbed her hands and bathed her temples.—Gradually the sound of war died away in the distance. Then Joseph and his helpers went forth to gather up the wounded and the dead. Colonel Campbell was found utterly lifeless, and the brook where Camillo used to launch his little boats, was red with his father's blood. They brought him in tenderly, washed his ghastly wounds, closed the glaring eyes, and left the widow and her household to mourn over him. Late in the night they persuaded her to go to rest; and when all was still, the weary family fell asleep on the floor; for not a bed was unoccupied.

This time they hoped to escape the conqueror's rage. But early in the morning a party of them came back and demanded that all the Catholics should be given up to them. Joseph replied as he had done before:

"I cannot give up my dying neighbors, whether they be Pikemen or Orangemen. I will do good to all and harm to none, come to me what may."

"That's impartial, anyhow," said the captain. He took some cockades from his pocket, and added, "Wear these, and my men will do you no harm."

"I cannot conscientiously wear one," replied Joseph, "because they are emblems of war."

The captain laughed half scornfully, and handing one to Alice, said, "well, my good girl, you can wear one and then you need not be afraid of our soldiers."

She looked very pleasantly into his face and answered, "I should be afeaid if I did not trust in something better than a cockade."

The leader of the Orangemen was arrested by the same spell that stopped the leader of the Pikemen. But some of his followers, who had been lingering about the door, called out, "what's the use of parleying? Isn't the old traitor nursing Catholic's to fight us when they get well? If he won't serve the government by fighting for us, he will at least do to stop a bullet as well as a braver man. Bring him out, and put him in the front ranks to be shot at!"

One of them seized Joseph to drag him away; but Alice laid her hand upon his arm, and said beseechingly:

"Before you take him, come and see the wounded Orangemen, with their wives and children, whom my father and mother have fed and tended night and day."

A pale figure, with bandaged head and one arm in a sling, came forth from an adjoining room and said, "Comrades, you surely cannot harm these people. They have fed our children ond buried our dead, as if we were their own brothers."

The soldiers listened and suddenly changing their mood, went off shouting, "Hurrah for the Quakers!"

Some days of comparative quiet followed.—Col. Campbell was buried in his own garden, with as much defference to the wishes of his widow as time and circumstances would permit. She returned from the funeral calmer than she had been, and quietly assisted in taking care of the wounded. But when she retired to her little room, and saw a crucifix fastened on the wall at the foot of her bed, she burst into tears and said, "Who has done this?"

Alice gently replied, "I did it. I found it in the mud where the little chapel used to stand. I know it is a sacred emblem to thee, and I thought it would pain thee to have it there; so I have washed it carefully and placed it in thy room."

The bereaved Catholic kissed the friendly hand that had done so kind a deed; and tears fell on it as she murmured, "Good child! may the Madonna bless thee!

Balmy is a blessing from any human heart, whether it be given in the name of Jesus or Mary, God or Allah. Alice slept well and guardian angels rejoiced over her in heaven.

Success alternated between the contending parties, and kept the country in a state of perpetual alarm. One week the widow of Col. Campbell was surrounded with victorious friends, and the next, she was in terror for her life. At last Camillo himself came with a band of successful insurgents. During a brief and agitated interview with his mother, he learned how kindly they had been sheltered in their neighbor's house, and how tenderly the remains of his father had been treated. When she pointed to the crucifix on the wall and told its history, his eyes filled with tears. "Oh, why cannot we of different faith treat each other thus?" was his inward thought; but he bowed his head in silence. Hearing loud voices, he started up suddenly, exclaiming, "There may be danger below!" Following the noise, he found soldiers threatening Friend Goodman, who stood with his back firmly placed against the door of an inner room. Seeing Camillo enter, and being aware of the great influence his family had with the Catholics, he said, "These men insist on carrying out the dying Orangemen who are sheltered here, and compelling me to see them shot. Is it thy will that these murders should be committed."

The young man took his hand, and in tones of deep respect answered, "Could you believe that I would suffer violence to be done to any under your roof, if I had power to prevent it?" Then turning to his soldiers he said, "These excellent people have injured no one. Through all these troubled times they have been kind alike to Pikemen and Orangemen; they have buried our dead and sheltered our widows. If you have any respect for the memory of my father, treat with respect all who wear the peaceful garb of the Quakers."

The men spoke apart for a while, and soon after left the house.

As Camillo passed the kitchen door, he saw Alice distributing boiled potatoes to a crowd of hungry children A soldier stood by insisting that she should wear a cross, which was the emblem of the Pikemen. She mildly replied. "I cannot consent to wear the cross, but I hope God will enable me to bear it."

The rude fellow who was somewhat intoxicated, touched her under the chin, and said, "Come mavoureen, do be a little more obliging."

Camillo instantly seized his arm, and exclaiming, "Behave decently, my lad," led him to the door. As he went, he turned toward Alice with an expression she never forgot, and said in low deep tones, "Words are too poor to thank you for what you have done for my mother."

The next day when he met Alice walking to meeting, he touched his hat respectfully and said, "It is imprudent for you to be in the road at this time, Miss Alice. Armed insurgents are every where abroad; and though there is a prevailing disposition not to injure the Quakers, still many of our men are too desperate to be always controlled."

She smiled and answered, "I thank thee for thy friendly caution, but I trust in the power that has hitherto protected me."

After a short pause, he said, "Your place of meeting is two miles from here. Where is the horse you used to ride?"

"A soldier took it from me, as I rode from Meeting several weeks ago."

"You see then, it is as I have said, unsafe for you to go," he rejoined. "Had you not better turn back?"

With great earnestness she answered, "Camillo, I cannot do otherwise than go. Our people are afflicted and bowed down. The soldiers have nearly consumed our provisions. Our women are almost worn out with the fatigue of constant nursing and perpetual alarms. All are not unwavering in their faith. It is the duty of the strong to sustain the weak; and therefore it is needful that we meet together for counsel and consolation."

The young man looked at her with affection and reverence. The fair complexion and shining ringlets were gone, but a serene and deep expression of soul imparted a more elevated beauty to her countenance. He parted with her with a blessing, simply and fervently uttered; but he entered the adjoining fields, and as he walked along he kept within sight, until she arrived at the place of meeting. While he thus watched her unseen, he recollected how often his taste had been offended by the quaint awkwardness of the Quaker garb; and uttered aloud the sequel to his thoughts, he said, "But beautiful and graceful will be her garb in heaven."

Soon after this interview, he departed with a strong escort to convey his mother and other Catholic women into a less turbulent district. Alice bade them farewell with undisguised sadness; for we learn to love those whom we serve, and there seemed little probability that they would ever return to reside in that troubled neighborhood.

The next time that she saw Camillo, he was brought into her father's house on a litter, senseless, and wounded, as it was supposed unto death. All the restoratives they could think of were applied, and at last, as Alice bent over him, bathing his temples, he opened his eyes with a dull unconscious stare, which gradually relaxed into a feeble smile, as he whispered, "My Quaker lady-bird." Some hours afterward, when she brought him drink, he gently pressed her hand and said, "thank you, dear Alice." These words were simple, but the expression of his eyes, and the pressure of his hand sent a thrill through the maiden, which she had never before experienced. That night she dreamed of winged children seen through flowering vines, and Camillo laughed when the parrot called her "Lady-bird."

Sorrow, like love, levels all distinctions, and melts all forms in its fiery furnace. In the midst of sickness and suffering, and every-day familiarity with death, there was no attention paid to customary proprieties. No one heeded whether Camillo, was tended by Alice or her mother: but if Alice were long absent, he complained that she came so seldom. As his health improved, they talked together of the flowers they used to plant on the mossy rock, and the little boats they launched on the rippling brook. Sometimes, in their merriest moods, they mocked the laughing of the old green parrot, and the cooing of the fan-tailed doves. Thus walking through the green lane of their childhood, they came unconsciously into the fairy land of love. All was bright and golden there, and but one shadow rested on the sunshine. When Camillo spoke of the little meeting house in the garden, and the image of "my donny," she grew very thoughtful; and he said with a sigh, "I wish, dear Alice, that we were of one religion." She smiled sweetly as she answered "are we not both of the religion of Christ?"

He kissed her hand, and said, "Your soul is always large and liberal, noble and kind; but others are not like you dear Alice."

And truly, when the war ceased, and Camillo Campbell, began to rebuild his demolished dwelling, and the young couple spoke of marriage, great was the consternation in both families.—Even the liberal mind of Joseph was greatly pained to have his daughter "marry out of Society," as their phrase is; but he strove to console Rachel, who was far more afflicted than himself. "The young people love each other," he said, "and it does not seem to be right to put any constraint on their affection. Camillo is a goodly youth, and I think the dreadful scenes he has lately witnessed, have exercised his mind powerfully on the subject of war. I have observed that he is thoughtful and candid; and if he does but act up to his own light, it is all I ask of him. He promises never to interfere with the freedom of Alice; and as she has adopted most of our principles from her own conviction, I do not fear that she will ever depart from them."

"Don't console thyself with any such idea,' replied Rachel. "She will have pictures of the Virgin Mary in her house, and priests will come there to say over their mummery; and small beginnings make great endings. At all events, one thing is certain. Alice will lose her membership in our society; and that it is which mainly grieves me. She is such a serious, sensible girl, that I always hoped to see her an esteemed minister among us."

"It is a disappointment to me also." replied Joseph; "but we must bear it cheerfully. It certainly is better to have our child go out of the Society and keep her principles than it would be to stay in Society, and depart from her principles as many do."

Mary Campbell was more disturbed than Rachel Goodman. In the first paroxism of her distress, she said she wished she had been killed in the war, rather than live to see her only son married to a black Protestant.

"Not a black Protestant, dear mother, only a dove-colored one," rejoined Camillo playfully.—Then he kissed her and reminded her of the story of the crucifix, and told her how noble and gentle, and good and sensible, his Alice was. As he talked, a vision rose before her of the little bed-room in the Quaker's farm house; she saw Rachel and Alice supporting the drooping heads of poor homeless Catholics, while they offered drinks to their feverish lips; and memory melted bigotry. She threw herself weeping into Camillo's arms and said, "Truly they did treat us like disciples of Christ. I once said to Alice may the Madonna bless thee; and now I say from the bottom of my heart, may the Madonna bless you both, my son."

And so Catholic and Quaker were married according to the forms of both their churches.

The Society of Friends mostly withdrew from the companionship of Alice, though they greeted her kindly at their meetings. The Catholics shook their heads and complained that Camillo Campbell was already half Quaker. Both prognosticated evil consequences from such a union. But the worst that happened was, Alice learned that there might be superstition in the cut of a garment, as well as in veneration for an image; and Camillo became convinced that hatred and violence were much greater sins than eating meat on Fridays.—Union Magazine.

Trick upon Birds.—That is a singular bird they call "The Adjutant" in India. He performs the duties of a scavenger, devouring the offal and punishing the whole family of snakes. He is a huge, long-beaked fellow, with an air rather "Dominie Sampson"-ish than military. Some of the English soldiers used to play sad tricks upon him. He would gobble up large bones of beef or a four-pound loaf, and when he had finished his huge meal, he would mount the highest pinnacle he could find, and stand on one leg like a mutilated statue, while it digested. The soldiers used to cleanse out shank bones of mutton, stuff them with gunpowder, connected with a slow match, then throw them to "The Adjutant" who swallowed them greedily; but while chuckling over his savory morsel, it would explode and blow him to atoms! Another trick upon the birds was to tie two legs of mutton together by a strong cord, leaving an interval of three or four yards, and then toss the rich repast among them, which soon found their way into the stomachs of two of the most active. As long as they kept together, it was all very well; but as soon as the cord tightened both became alarmed and took wing, mutually astonished at the phenomenon, no doubt. A laughable tugging match then ensued in the air, each "Adjutant" striving to mount higher than the other, till at last they attained a great elevation. When at length the weaker bird was forced to disgorge his mutton, a new power came into play—the force of gravity; and the pendulum leg of mutton, after some ridiculous oscillations, brought the conquerer down to the earth a great deal faster than he wished.

The Surgeon's Revenge.

The following deeply interesting story is related by Dr. Gibson, in his lectures before the Medical Class of the University of Pennsylvania. The hero of the story is Vesald, one of the most eminent of the Italian Surgeons, and this narrative is said to have been derived from an ancient manuscript on parchment, accidentally found between the backs of two pictures, glued together, each picture in the style of Titian, and supposed to be the work of his hand:

Andrea Vesale, says the manuscript, first saw the light in the city of Brussels, in the year 1614. His father was an apothecary, attached to the service of the Princess Margaret, aunt of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and governess of the Low Countries. Providence conferred on him the double advantage of being a native of the land which divides with Italy the glory of being the richest and the most enlightened of the nations of the earth, of coming into the world at a period when a general and healthy ferment in the minds of men, had, in a great measure, tended to break through and disperse the stagnant scum of ignorance and barbarism which had hitherto obscured them. His parents had educated him for the medical profession; his own peculiar genius directed him to the study of anatomy, which he pursued with an ardor that led to the most successful results. Up to the period when Vesale first rendered himself conspicuous, the anatomy of the human body was so imperfectly understood as scarcely to merit that the term of science should be applied to the dim and confused ideas entertained of it. Vesale was the first to break through the trammels with which ignorance and bigotry had crippled the march of science: surmounting with admirable courage and constancy, the disgust, the terror, and even the peril, inseparable from this description of labor, to which he had devoted himself, he was to be seen whole days and nights in the cemeteries, surrounded by the festering remnants of mortality, or hovering about the gibbets, and disputing with the vulture for its prey, in order to compose a perfect skeleton from the remains of executed criminals left there to be devoured by the carrion bird.

It was during a sojourn at Basle, after his return from Italy, that Vesale first beheld at the house of Hans Holbein, the painter, Isabella Van Steenwiyk, the daughter of a merchant at Hœrlem, who was destined to exercise some influence over his future life. Vesale was then scarcely twenty-eight years of age, and already he had attained the summit of his well-directed ambition. He enjoyed the countenance and friendship of the celebrated men of the day. Erasmus, Melancthon, Neltwyck, Verazio, Holbein, and Titian, were proud to be numbered among his friends.—The Emperor Charles the Fifth, informed by public rumor of the extraordinary talents of the young professor, bestowed upon Vesale, without solicitation, the important charge of his first physician.—At the very moment when these honors were so fast accumulating, Vesale first saw Isabella Van Steenwiyk, and a vision of happiness dawned upon him from her calm blue eyes. The family of Van Steenwiyk was a wealthy and honorable one, far superior to that of Vesale in birth and fortune; but the distinguished position the latter had acquired for himself, entitled him to aspire to an alliance even more exalted. The son of the Princess Margaret's apothecary would have been rejected by the rich Heerlem burgher; the Emperor's first physician was accepted by him as the most eligible son-in-law. The marriage was solemnized, and Vesale, accompanied by his young bride, set off for Seville, where Charles then held his court. Vesale was a man of great determination, of strong feeling and violent passions, capable of great extremes of love and hatred, and of most unlimited devotion and the most relentless rancor. But he was ignorant of all those nicer intermediate shades of sentiment which soften and harmonize the character, and scorned as effeminate the gallantries and graceful attentions which youthful wives looked upon as their prerogative, and which, although but too often merely the semblance of love, are often, too, more effective in winning woman's confidence and tenderness, than love itself. No two natures could be more dissimilar than Vesale and his wife. She was gentle, calm, and undemonstrative, not to be roused into any violent evidence of love or anger, and so even-tempered as to be pronounced by many apathetic. Her fair and serene countenance was the mirror of a soul as serene, yet she was capable of great depth of feeling, although her natural timidity prevented the silent workings of her heart from appearing on the surface.

She loved her husband truly; but there was so much of awe mingled with her affection, as to throw an appearance of restraint over her demeanor towards him, even in the privacy of domestic life. The very nature of his profession and occupations was calculated to increase that awe, and even to create some degree of repugnance, in a shrinking mind, which nothing but strong affection could overcome. Isabella's nature required skillful drawing out and tender fostering. Vesale, unfortunately, understood nothing of this sort: he mistook her timidity for coldness, and resented it accordingly; this led to estrangement on her part, which he attributed to dislike, and jealous distrust at last took possession of his soul.

Amidst the gallantries of Sevile, where, for a woman to be young and attractive, was to command the attention and authorize the devotions of the other sex—it was no difficult task to arouse the susceptibilities of a suspicious husband. Vesale's talents and position, in the Emperor's household, had brought him into contact with all the men of learning and science about the court; the fame of his wife's beauty soon conferred upon him another sort of distinction; and although at first, in accordance with the housewifery habits of her country, she rarely showed herself in public, except to go to mass, enough was seen of her on these occasions, to render an acquaintance with the husband of one so fair, the object of many a gay courtier's ambition. Vesale's house became the resort of all that was noble and gallant in Seville, and he, for a time, believed his own scientific conversation to be the attraction. At first the young wife showed her usual calm indifference to the admiration that followed her wherever she was seen; but at last, something in her manner and countenance, whenever one particular person appeared, or his name was mentioned, betrayed that there did exist a being who had discovered the secret of causing the blood to flow more tumultuously through her veins. That person was Don Alvar de Solis; and as he was young, handsome, gay, and the most inconstant gallant in Seville, the suspicions of Vesale were painfully aroused. He took silent note of the unusual emotions that agitated Isabella whenever that nobleman was in her presence.

The general conduct of Don Alvar was calculated to baffle suspicion, being marked by indifference. This would have misled the vigilant husband, had he not, on one occasion, when his back was turned towards Don Alvar, perceived him, in an opposite mirror, fix his kindling eyes upon Isabella, with an expression not to be mistaken; while she grew red and pale by turns, and then, as though unable to surmount her agitation, rose and left the room. Shortly after, Vesale received an anonymous note, saying, "Look to your wife and Don Alvar de Solis, and be not deceived by appearances. They only want a fitting opportunity to dishonor you. Even now he carries about the glove she dropped for him at mass." Vesale shut himself up to ponder over the most effectual means of avenging himself. His resolution was promptly taken. He had established schools of anatomy at San Lucar and Cordova, obtained the Emperor's permission to visit them, quitted Seville ostensibly for that purpose, but returned the same night, concealed himself in a tenament belonging to him, at some distance from his abode in the Alcazar, which was devoted to the double purpose of a laboratory and dissecting room.—He had taken no person into his confidence; he was alone with his vengeance, and he listened only to his counsel. At dark, on the following evening, he issued forth, muffled to the eyes in a woman's mantle and hood, and left a letter at Don Alvar's habitation, containing an embroidered glove of Isabella's, and these words: "I have obtained the key to Vesale's laboratory during his absence; be at the gate an hour after midnight, and you will be admitted on pronouncing the name of Isabella." The assignation was punctually kept by Don Alvar. At half an hour past midnight, he left his house alone, but he never returned to it. Whither he had gone, none could say, nor could any trace of him ever be discovered. It was supposed he must have missed his footing and fallen into the Guadalquiver, near which his abode was situated; and that his body had been swept away by the waves into the ocean.

Such an occurrence was calculated to produce a great sensation in the place where it happened; and Vesale, recalled, three weeks after, by the illness of his wife, found the disappearance of Don Alvar the theme of every tongue. The altered appearance of Isabella was attributed by Vesale to grief for the mysterious absence of Don Alvar, and that conviction took from him all the pity of her sufferings. It chanced to be the festival of Santa Isabella, and, to do honor to her patron saint, as well as to celebrate the return of her husband, Isabella put on her wedding dress, and seating herself by an open casement that overlooked the Alcazar gardens, she watched for his coming. But whilst her eyes were vainly fixed upon the path by which she expected him to appear, a hand was laid upon her shoulder, and turning round, she beheld Vesale standing by her side. "I have ordered the supper to be laid in my study, said he, and, taking her hand, he led her away to the room in question, dismissed the attendant, and closed the door. Everything wore a festive air, yet the repast was cheerless. Perceiving that she tasted nothing, Vesale poured a few drops from a vial of elixir into a cup of Malaga wine, and presenting it to her, "Drink this," he said; "it is a sovereign cure for the complaint you are suffering from." "Pledge me in the draught," she replied, filling up a goblet from the same flask, and handing it to him, "and it will bring a quicker healing to me. Let us drink to our absent friends, Andrea." Vesale accepted the offering and they emptied their goblets together. "Talking of absent friends;" said he, suddenly fixing his eyes upon her, "you have not yet spoken to me of Don Alvar de Solis. Are all hopes of hearing of him relinquished?" Isabella started, and blushed. "Nothing is known of him," she stammered; "a strange mystery envelops his disappearance." "What if I should be able to clear it up," returned her husband, "and tell you wherefore he has disappeared, and whither he has gone?"

"Don Alvar de Solis," he continued, "was a braggart and a libertine, and boasted that no woman ever resisted his seductions, that no husband ever suspected the injury he was preparing for him." Then grasping his wife by the hand, he led her up to a door at the farther end of the room, and throwing it wide open, revealed to her view a human skeleton, suspended within, holding in one of its bony hands one of her own embroidered gloves. "Behold," he said, pointing at the ghastly spectacle, "the gallant and beautiful Don Alvar de Solis—the object of your guilty love. Contemplate him well, if the sight can render your last moments happier, for you are about to die too; the wine I have just given you was poisoned!"

When the last dreadful sentence, and its still more dreadful illustration, burst upon her affrighted senses, she became paralyzed with excess of emotion; the scream, which had risen to her throat, died there in strangled murmurs, and sinking back, she fell as one dead upon the arm of Vesale. She was not dead, however; he had not poisoned her; that crime he had hesitated to commit, yet he was not the less her murderer. Convulsion followed convulsion, and, at last, she died; and, in that supreme moment, the hour that preceded death, her husband, who had never quitted her, beheld one of those phenomena which sometimes attend the dying. Awaking from a torpid slumber, consciousness and memory returned at once, and with them a calm and a courage she had never possessed in the flush of life. "Andrea," said she, fixing her dim eye upon her husband. "I am dying by your hand, yet I am innocent; I never wronged you in thought or deed.—Don Alvar pursued me with his love and his threats, but I repulsed him. I never loved but you! I feared and honored you as much as I loved—but I dared not tell you of his pursuit! Oh, Andrea, believe my words; the dying deal not in falsehood! Should I be thus calm, were I guilty?" Vesale, sinking upon his knees, solemnly protested his faith in the innocence of his wife, and, with choking sobs, adjured her to believe that he had only feigned to give her poison; that he could not nerve his hand to take away her life; that the terror of death, and not death itself, was upon her! And, while he yet spoke, Isabella murmured, "Thanks be to Heaven for this!" and drawing his hand towards her, laid it upon her heart, and as she did so, it ceased to beat.

Oregon.—The Union publishes a letter from Mr. Benton to the Secretary of State, wherein the Senator informs Mr. Buchanan that he has accounts from Oregon to the 1st of November; that the Oregonians were greatly discontented by the failure of the Oregon bill at the last session, but consoled by the reception of Mr. Buchanan's letter. They did think of calling a convention to "provide for themselves"—establish a territorial government, we presume, on the independent principle—but thought better of it and concluded to wait in hope a little longer.

The Recent Elections in France.—The details of these elections are very curious, as far as known. We have only the partial returns of Paris—and they are as follows:

Population of Paris, - - - - - - - -	1,150,000
Estimated number of voters, - - - -	300,000
Number of votes actually taken, - - -	210,000
Estimate of the votes given to the Lamartine party, or moderate republicans, -	180,000
Estimate of votes given to the Rollin and Blanc party, or socialist - - - - -	30,000

These estimates are predicted on the actual returns from several sections, or districts. Paris is divided into twelve wards, (arrondissements,) and these again into two hundred and eighty sections, or districts, as we call them. Each district took generally less than 1,000 votes. This minute division of the city of Paris into districts, caused the quiet and calmness with which the election was conducted. The elections in New York are conducted on the same plan, which generally produces the same quiet aspect. The whole business is begun and ended in one day in this city—and in two days in Paris.

These are the election facts in Paris, and they probably are alike throughout France. They give us a high opinion already of the practical capacity of the French people for conducting their republic. They must have arranged these matters on the experience of the United States. Again, the results show a very full vote, and great political excitement, in contradiction to the grossly false statements of the English press, which asserts that no interest was taken in them. Indeed, the proportion of actual votes taken in Paris to the population, is greater than was ever taken in New York. The total defeat of the socialists is a good omen of permanency. Success to the French Republic!—N. Y. Herald.

Great Hail Storm in the Seminole Country—Destruction of Wild Fowl, &c.—Marcelus Duval, Esq., Seminole country, on Wednesday last. From him we learn that on the 26th of March last, the valley of the Canadian, about one hundred and fifty miles west of this, was visited with one of the severest storms of hail that ever fell, the hail-stones being about the size of hens' eggs, and some even larger. Where Mr. Duval was, the hail-stones were not so large, he being on a ridge, but on either side, on the river and in the prairie, the storm was terrific.

The wild geese and brants, a species of the wild goose, appeared to be on the wing that day, migrating in great numbers from south to north, and were killed by hundreds with the hail, while flying. Thirty were counted in one place, lying dead, by some persons who passed the spot shortly after the storm. Snme fell dead in the yard of a Seminole Chief named Micanopy, who picked them up, had them cooked and ate them. He told the agent afterwards he thought the great Spirit had sent them to the Indians, knowing they were getting scarce of provisions. Some of the Indians were afraid to eat them, supposing the destruction of so great a quantity of these birds portended some evil to their country. Others carried them home by horse loads. The agent says that he has never heard of anything of the like before in his life, and when he left, the Indians were still bringing in from the prairies wild geese and brants by horse loads. Several of the Indian cabins were blown down and others unroofed by the storm, but fortunately no one was killed.—Fort Smith, (Ark.) Her., April 12.

Heaves in Horses.—It is said that horses may be greatly relieved, if not cured, by the use of chopped straw instead of hay.

Live to do Good.

BY GEORGE W. BETHUNE, D. D.

Live to do good: but not with thought to win
From man reward of any kindness done:
Remember him who died on cross for sin—
The merciful, the meek, rejected One;
When He was slain for crime of doing good,
Canst thou expect return of gratitude?

Do good to all: but, while thou servest best
And at thy greatest cost, nerve thee to bear,
When thine own heart with anguish is oppressed
The cruel taunt, the cold averted air,
From lips which thou hast taught in hope to pray,
And eyes whose sorrows thou hast wiped away.

Still do thou good: but for His holy sake
Who died for thine, fixing thy purpose ever
High as His throne, no wrath of man can shake;
So shall He own thy generous endeavor.
And take thee to His conqueror's glory up,
When thou hast shared the Saviour's bitter cup.

Do nought but good: for such the noble strife
Of virtue is 'gainst wrong to venture love,
And for thy foe devote a brother's life,
Content to wait the recompense above;
Brave for the truth, to fiercest insult meek,
In mercy strong, in vengeance only weak.

For the Western Literary Messenger.

John Clare—the Peasant Poet.

The writings of JOHN CLARE are an example of the impress of nature in her gentler and most lovely moods, upon a mind of vivid perceptions, yet wholly unacquainted with "the riches, rules, and prejudices of literature." His poetry came fresh from his heart—a heart full of genial love for the beauties of "sequestered nature," which he observed and studied with the deepest and purest enthusiasm.

The son of a crippled pauper, his early education was obtained by his own extra work as a ploughboy, in two weeks earning enough to pay his schooling for one: hence it is not strange that his range of bookish information was a limited one. His first poem was written at the age of thirteen, and was soon followed by several others.

His first volume of poems he published in 1820, at the age of 26; and being accompanied by a well written sketch of the early life of the author, it attracted much attention and was cordially noticed by the critics. He now found many friends who made up for him quite a little fortune. He was enabled to purchase, and stock a small farm in his native place, and marrying a neighboring farmer's daughter, with his parents and his young wife near, all proud of his genius and success, there seemed to be nothing wanting to ensure his happiness.

In 1821 he published "The Village Minstrel and other Poems," in two volumes, which were productions of higher merit and more finish than his previous ones, and fully established his claim to the title of a true poet.

Alas! that we are compelled to shade this pleasing picture, but as his discretion and knowledge were not equal to the management of his business affairs—he speculated in farming,—and amidst growing embarrasments sank into a state of nervous despondency and despair. He is now the tenant of a private asylum "hopeless though not dead to passing events."

Thus sadly is all his early promise blasted.—His naturally cheerful temperament, and quiet flow of feeling and passion seemed to promise a long life of useful and contented felicity. But as he has said, and it is a most natural yet original comparison—speaking of the hopes and prospects of youth:

> Spring bids full many buds to swell
> Which cannot grow to flowers.

Below are two specimens of his faithful and picutresque descriptions of nature.

TO THE GLOW-WORM—A SONNET.

Tasteful illumination of the night,
Bright, scattered, twinkling star of spangled earth!
Hail to the nameless colored dark and light,
The witching nurse of thy illumined birth.
In thy still hour how dearly I delight
To rest my weary bones, from labor free;
In lone spots, out of hearing, out of sight,
To sigh day's smothered pains; and pause on thee.
Bedecking dangling brier and lvied tree,
Or diamonds tipping on the grassy spear;
Thy pale-faced glimmering light I love to see,
Gilding and glistening in the dew-drop near;
O, still-hour's mate! my easing heart throbs free,
While tiny bents low bend with many an added tear.

THE THRUSH'S NEST—A SONNET.

Within a thick and spreading hawthorn bush
That overhung a mole-hill large and round,
I heard from morn to morn a merry thrush
Sing hymns of rapture while I drank the sound
With joy—and oft an unintruding guest,
I watched her secret toils from day to day;
How true she warped the moss to form her nest,
And modelled it within with wood and clay.
And by and by, like heath-bells gilt with dew,
There lay her shining eggs as bright as flowers,
Dark-spotted over shells of green and blue;
And there I witnessed in the summer hours,
A brood of nature's minstrels chirp and fly,
Glad as the sunshine and the laughing sky.

PERSEVERE.—It is said that Senator Cameron of Pennsylvania, uses a letter stamp on which is engraved a printing press, over which is the motto, PERSEVERE. In regard to this same risen printer, an exchange paper remarks as follows:

"Twenty-five years ago, and this same Senator of the United States Congress was seen to enter a printing office at Harrisburg, Penn., with a small bundle of clothing flung across his shoulders on a stick, and humbly asking for labor, whereby he might earn sufficient to support himself and his indigent parents. He was taken as an apprentice to the business—served his employers faithfully, and now, twenty five years afterward, we find that he has graduated from an obscure printing office to the Senate chamber of the United States! Then he was but a poor boy—now he is the distinguished Senator from one of the largest and noblest States in the federal union!—So much for the republican origin of our statesmen, and so much for the fostering and congenial influence of that humble but excellent institution of learning a printing office!"

Let all other sons of type stamp upon their hearts the motto, PERSEVERE!

The Mormon Conventicle.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Passing up Merrimack street the other day, my attention was arrested by a loud earnest voice, apparently engaged in preaching, or rather "holding forth," in the second story of the building opposite. I was in the mood to welcome any thing of a novel character, and following the sound, I passed up a flight of steps leading to a long, narrow and somewhat shabby room, dignified by the appellation of Classic hall.

Seating myself, I looked about me. There were from fifty to one hundred persons in the audience, in which nearly all classes of this heterogeneous community seemed pretty fairly represented, all listening with more or less attention to the speaker.

He was a young man, with a dark, enthusiastic complexion, black eyes and hair, with his collar thrown back, and his coat cuffs turned over, revealing a somewhat unique quantity of "fine linen," bending over his coarse board pulpit, and gesticulating with the vehemence of Hamlet's player, "tearing his passion to rags." A band of mourning crape, fluttering with the spasmodic action of his left arm, and an allusion to "our late beloved brother, Joseph Smith," sufficiently indicated the sect of the speaker. He was a Mormon—a saint of the latter days.

His theme was the power of faith. Although evidently unlearned, and innocent enough of dealing in such "abominable matters as a verb or a noun, which no Christian ear can endure," to have satisfied Jack Cade himself, there was a straight forward vehemence and intense earnestness in his manner, which at once disarmed my criticism. He spoke of Adam, in Paradise, as the lord of this lower world—"For," said he, "water couldn't drown him, fire couldn't burn him, cold couldn't freeze him—nothing could harm him, for he had all the elements under his feet. And what, my hearers was the secret of his power? His faith in God: that was it. Well, the devil wanted this power. He behaved in a mean, ungentlemanly way, and deceived Eve, and lied to her, he did. And so Adam lost his faith. And all this power over the elements that Adam had, the devil got, and has it now. He is the prince and the power of the air, consequently, he is the master of the elements and lord of this world. He has filled it with unbelief, and robbed man of his birthright, and will do so until the hour of the power of darkness is ended, and the mighty angel comes down with the chain in his hand to bind the old serpent and dragon."

Another speaker, a stout, black-browed "son of thunder," gave an interesting account of his experience. He had been one of the apostles of the Mormon Evangel, and had visited Europe. He had "but three cents in his pocket," when he reached England. He went to the high professors of all sects, and they would not receive him; they pronounced him "damned already." He was reduced to great poverty and hunger: alone in a strange land, with no one to bid him welcome.

He was on the very verge of starvation.—"Then," said he, "I knelt down and prayed in earnest faith, "'Lord, give me this day my daily bread.' O, I tell ye, I prayed with a good appetite; and I rose up and was moved to go to a house at hand. I knocked at the door, and when the owner came, I said to him, 'I am a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ, from America. I am starving, will you give me some food?" 'Why, bless you, yes,' said the man, 'sit down and eat as much as you please.' And I did sit down at his table, blessed be God; but, my dear hearers, he was not a professor; he was not a Christian, but one of Robert Owen's infidels. The Lord reward him for his kindness."

In listening to these modern prophets, I discovered, as I think, the great secret of their success in making converts. They speak to a common feeling; they minister to a universal want. They contrast strongly the miraculous power of the gospel in the apostolic time with the present state of our nominal Christianity. They ask for the signs of divine power; the faith, overcoming all things, which opened the prison doors of the apostles, gave them power over the elements, which rebuked disease and death itself, and made visible to all the presence of the living God. They ask for any declaration in the Scriptures that this miraculous power of faith was to be confined to the first professors of Christianity. They speak a language of hope and promise to weak, weary hearts, tossed and troubled, who have wandered from sect to sect, seeking in vain for the primal manifestations of the divine power.

In speaking of Mormonism as a delusion, I refer more particularly to the apocryphal book of Mormon. That the great majority of the "Latter Day Saints" are honest and sincere fanatics, I have no reason to doubt. They have made great sacrifices and endured severe and protracted persecution for their faith. The reports circulated against them by their unprincipled enemies in the West, are, in the main, destitute of foundation.—I place no dependence upon the charges made against them by the ruffian mob of the Mississippi Valley, and the reckless slave-drivers, who, at the point of the bayonet and bowie-knife, expelled them from Missouri, and signalized their Christian crusade against unbelievers by murdering old men, and violating their innocent wives and daughters. It is natural that the wrong-doers should hate those whom they have so foully injured.

The Prophet himself, the master-spirit of this extraordinary religious movement, is no more.—He died by the hands of wicked and barbarous men, a martyr—unwilling, doubtless, but still a martyr of his faith. For, after all, Joe Smith could not have been wholly insincere. Or, if so at the outset, it is more than probable that his extraordinary success, his wonderful power over the minds of men, caused him to seem a miracle and a marvel to himself; and like Mahommed and Napoleon, to consider himself a chosen instrument of the eternal power.

In the "Narrative of an Eye-witness of the Mormon Massacre," published in a western paper, I was a good deal impressed by the writer's account of the departure of the prophet from "the holy city," to deliver himself up to the State authorities at Warsaw. It is well understood, that in so doing he was about to subject himself to extreme hazard. The whole country round about was swarming with armed men, eager to imbrue their hands in his blood. The city was in a fearful state of alarm and excitement. The great Nauvoo legion, with its two thousand strong of armed fanatics, was drawn up in the principal square. A word from the prophet would have converted that dark, silent mass into desperate and unsparing defenders of their leader, and the holy places of their faith. Mounted on his favorite black horse, he rode through the glittering files, and with words of cheer and encouragement, exhorted them to obey the laws of the State, and give their enemies no excuse for persecution and outrage. "Well," said he, as he left them, "they are good boys, if I never see them again." Taking leave of his family, and his more intimate friends, he turned his horse, and rode up in front of the great temple, as if to take a final look at the proudest trophy of his power. After contemplating it for a while in silence, he put spurs to his horse, in company with his brother, who, it will be recollected, shared his fate in the prison, dashed away towards Warsaw, and the prairie horizon shut down beneath him and the city of saints for the last time.

Once in the world's history we were to have a yankee prophet, and we have had him in Joe Smith For good or for evil, he has left his track on the great pathway of life; or, to use the words of Home, "knocked out a window in the wall of the nineteenth century," whence his rude, bold, good-humored face will peep out upon the generations to come. But the prophet has not trusted his fame merely to the keeping of the spiritual. He has incorporated himself with the enduring stone of the great Nauvoo temple, which when completed, will be the most splendid architectural monument in the new world. With its huge walls of hewn stone—its thirty gigantic pillars, loftier than those of Baalbec—their massive caps carved into the likeness of enormous human faces, themselves resting upon cresent moons, with a gigantic profile of a face within the curve —it stands upon the elevation of the most beautiful city site of the west, overlooking the "Father of Waters;"—a temple unique and wonderful as the fate of its builder, embodying in its singular and mysterious architecture, the Titan idea of the Pyramids, and the solemn and awe-inspiring thought which speaks from the Gothic piles of the middle ages.—Howitt's Journal.

Western Eloquence.—The following are extract from the speech of the Rev. Mr. Magoon, of Cincinnati, made at the anniversary of the New York Baptist Bible Society on Friday last:

"It seems strange to me that we scrape every cent we can reach to send the Gospel to our very antipodes, and forget those who come to our own land to make their homes. Do the Catholics build schools and colleges? We may do the same. Let us meet them in kindness, in philanthropy, in discussion, and win them. Should a Catholic build at one corner of my house, an Infidel on another, and a Jew in front, when I came forth from my morning devotions I would say good day to each, and pray that God would bless them all. When another speaker told of the persecution of Baptists by the French King, he might have gone farther—he might have told how a man rose in Paris and battled nobly and successfully for their cause, and that man was a foreigner everywhere—it was Cremieux, the Jew—subsequently called, in the Providence of God, to be Minister of Justice. It is our privilege to give all men freedom to worship God. If they are in error we may pity them, but should never abuse. But the greatest obstacle to be removed is defunct Protestantism—Evangelism congealed. Some men come to the West who had the odor of sanctity, who had perhaps been active class leaders, on this side of the mountains, but they had left all the Christian heat they ever had behind them—they were volcanoes burnt out. They would stop in some devoted place and settle down, the select wheat of God's harvest, predestinated from all eternity to sit in their infernal laziness while the world was perishing around them. They are the fossil remains of Pharaoh's lean kine; possessed of a vis inertia almost sufficient to stop the wheels of the Almighty's chariot of mercy, and banish every ray of His glory from man."

In reference to the kind of preachers received at the West, he says:

"The education soaked in from the outside, like a Thompsonian bath, is useless there. There is no field for such preachers. Black-board knowledge and Latin roots, emptiness in the head, green glasses over the eyes, dyspepsia in the stomach, and a diploma in his hand, do not suit the people—they want what the Scotch call 'gumption'—they want men like Ringgold's flying artillery, who know how to load and fire in the hottest of the fight. There is no need to wait for a church to call a pastor in the West; he can call his church himself. With a log cabin for a vestry, he can have around him a cathedral whose arches were wrought and wreathed, whose roof was adorned in the way the temples of Greece never knew—the blue sky is visible through its dome, the setting sun streams in between its pillars, and there, in a garb as simple as the sublime truths he tells, he can preach the Word of Life; there is no need of fine linen in double quantity—linen under and linen over his garment—he will not want two shirts."

How he rose.—A True sketch.—About forty years ago, somewhere in the woods near the line between Tennessee and Kentucky, in a log cabin 16 feet by 18, which was already occupied by a brood of ten or twelve children, was born a youngster, the hero of our sketch. In his infancy he was fed on corn and hominy, bear meat and the flesh of such wild varmints, as were caught in the woods. At twelve years of age, he was put out to work with a neighbor as a farm boy, and drove oxen, hoed corn, raised tobacco in the summer, cured it in the winter till he was seventeen years old, when he took to making brick; to which he added the profession of a carpenter; and by these successive steps in mechanical arts he became able, by his own unassisted skill to rear a house from a clay-pit, or from the stump, and complete it in all its parts, and to do it, too, in a manner that none of his competitors could surpass. His panel doors are to this day the wonder and admiration of all the country, in which they continue to swing on hinges. He never saw the inside of a school house or a church till after he was eighteen years old. By the assistance of an old man in the neighborhood, he learned to read and write, when a farm boy. Having achieved these valuable acquisitions by the aid of another, all his other education has been the fruit of his own application and perseverance. At the age of twenty-two, he conceived the idea of fitting himself for the practice of law. He at first procured an old copy of Blackstone, and having after the close of his daily labors by nightly studies over a pitch-knot fire in his log cabin mastered the contents of that compendium of common law, he pursued his researches into other elementary works.

And having thus, by great diligence, acquired the rudiments of his profession, he met with an old lawyer who had quit the practice, or whose practice had quit him, with whom he made a bargain for his secretary library for which he was to pay him $120 in carpenter's work; and the chief part of the job to be done in payment of these old musty books was dressing and laying down a floor or floors, at three dollars per square of ten feet. The library paid for, our hero dropped the adze, plane and trowel, and we soon after hear of him as one of the most prominent members of the Mississippi bar, and an able statesman and orator. "I heard him one day," says one, "make two speeches in succession, of three hours in length each, to the same audience, and not a movement testified any weariness on the part of a single auditor, and during their delivery the assembly seemed swayed by the orator as weeds before the wind."

That poor farm boy is at present at Washington, a member of Congress from Mississippi. His name is Patrick W. Tompkins. He is a self-made man, and his history shows what a humble boy can do when he determines to try.—Saturday Rambler.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.—Our eastern religious exchanges are filled with the proceedings of the various benevolent and religious associations, whose anniversaries have lately been held in New York, Baltimore, and Troy. We have read these thoroughly; with profound interest, and with unfeigned pleasure. Most of the reports present a favorable aspect, and will tend to encourage the friends of humanity. Among the Societies are, the American Tract, the American Baptist Home Mission, the Foreign Evangelical, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, the American Home Missionary, the American Protestant, the American Colonization, the Moral Reform and Guardian, the American Tract Union, the New York Sunday School Union, and the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.—Among the resolutions offered at the meeting of the last mentioned, is one with the sentiments of which every American ought to concur. It is this:

Resolved, That we contemplate with delight the progress of emancipation in the colonies of Sweden, Denmark and France, in Lahore, Peru and New-Granada, and earnestly hope that the last spot on earth where slavery exists will not be the republic that was first to proclaim the equality of man, and his inalienable title to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

At the meeting of the Home Missionary Society, a resolution, to the amount that the West is a promising field, inviting generous cultivation, was offered by the Rev. E. L. MAGOON of Cincinnati, and upon it he made one of the most original and ingenious speeches we have read for a long time. We cannot forbear making the following somewhat lengthy extract on the extent and grandeur of the "field."

"Some people wonder at the transformation which takes place in the mental character of those who move beyond the mountains. This is all very natural. Let a New Englander leave this city to-night, to-morrow morning, take his breakfast in Albany, and the next morning at Buffalo. There he finds a 'dreadful nice' village, and by just stepping through the bushes outside he confronts Niagara. That is the key-note of the great anthem of the West. The entranced spectator beholds a new world unfolding, and thenceforth every thing grows collossal to his view. He steps on board a magnificent steamer and traverses one inland sea, and then another, and yet another, a distance of fifteen hundred and eighty-five miles from Buffalo, to Chicago. He has now mastered several ideas vaster and more original than he ever dreamed of before. He glides down the Illinois river and enters the Missouri, up which he pushes his course more than two thousand miles. On some beautiful morning he ascends a bluff, and beholds around him a scene which the steppes of Asia, the pampas of South America, and the arid desert of Africa would never enable him to conceive. It seems as if by some strange magic the undulations of a vast ocean were suddenly arrested and transformed into verdure the most vivid, and an infinitude of flowers the most georgous; one rolling plain rising above another and stretching away as far as the eye can reach, presenting a prospect the most splendid, seen through an atmosphere the most pure. Here and there a fairy group of trees arise, and the far off horizon is skirted with majestic forests. The bee is on the wing, fragrance fills the air, vast flocks of wild fowl nestle in the waving herbage, or hover like a cloud above the plain, while vaster herds of buffalo and deer graze cheerfully beneath sunny skies that seem to bend their placid majesty close around. Thenceforth there is poetry in that Yankee's mind which will outlast the journey of life. He resumes his voyage and descends to the 'Father of Waters,' and thence, by St. Louis, to New Orleans.—Having there heard almost every tongue, and seen ships from every nation of the civilized world he begins to think of returning to 'get his things and move West.'' He plants himself on the warm side of the smoke-stack, or shady side of the wheel-house, as the season may require' muses to himself as he passes through the long reaches of gigantic wilderness, where not a trace of man is seen, admires the frequent clearings, wonders at the growing towns, and greets passing steamers, pumps every man dry on board with interminable questions, whistles and whittles his way through a continuous voyage as far as from New York to Liverpool, and finds himself at length in Cincinnati, the great heart of the mighty giant, only the fringe of whose garment as yet he has seen. True he has surveyed some portions of the field eight thousand miles in circumference which stretches from the Alleghany to the Rocky Mountains, from the Lakes of the North to the Gulf of Mexico.—He knows that this is the most delightful climate, as well as the most productive soil ever prepared for the habitation of man, and that it is capable of supporting the densest population on the face of the globe. He has discovered that Illinois, Missouri and Ohio alone could be divided into twenty-one states as large as Massachusetts, and that these three segments of the great circle of the West could sustain twenty-millions of inhabitants—more than the present population of the whole United States. He has traversed a little of the twenty-five thousand miles of river, lake, rail-road and canal navigation now open within this central area, and knows that beyond the portion yet occupied there is ample room to form a whole coronet of new states where the refugee monarchs of continental Europe might become useful citizens, and the Queen of England could endow her offspring with ample farms, even if a bountiful Providence should continue to bless her for eight years to come as in days and months that are past. Your Yankee adventurer has seen this, felt this, and after such experience how do you expect to cramp him into a nut-shell style and compel him in the great waters of his thought to fish with a pin-hook?—Do you suppose that Michael Angelo with natural ease and genial taste could descend from the dome of St. Peter's and the fresco of the Last Judgement to paint a minature profile of Tom Thumb? The observing and thinking man who explores the region we have indicated gets his ideas stretched out, his soul mightily elongated, and exalted, long before his journey is complete. He has grown into the gigantic proportions of what he has learned to admire. He has become a westerner, he is a Yankee expanded, a New Englander enlarged."

CYCLOPEDIA OF MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ANECDOTES.—The third number of these racy anecdotical excerpta, may be found at the book-store of L. Danforth, & Co., and it is truly worth the cost.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEM.—The last number of the London Quarterly Review, spoken of last week, contains a lengthy and very able review of Tennyson's Princess: a Medley, which has lately been republished in this country. The reviewer very justly accuses Mr. Tennyson of an occasional absence of refinement in his writings; of a want of clearness; and an occasional want of truth in imagery and diction. He thinks the poet is "most audacious in the manufacture of vocables" and objects to his habit of turning adjectives into substantives ad libitum. "The Princess" is admired for its dramatic power and other good qualities, and on the whole the critique is candid and well toned.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for June has been on our table for a week. The publisher is prompt enough "in all conscience," and certainly MRS. HALE, the long standing and truly worthy editor, manages to send forth a very valuable book. This periodical is the oldest monthly in the United States. The best literary talent in the country has been from time to time, devoted to its columns. One of the engravings in the present issue, purporting to be a full length portrait of "one of our Contributors," (Grace Greenwood, we guess) is "beautiful exceedingly." The literary contents are by Miss Leslie, Mrs. Ellet, Helen Irving, Willis, Simms, etc. Mr. Godey offers the Lady's Book and his Lady's Dollar Newspaper, for three dollars:—a very reasonable offer.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.—We shall probably publish next week the lecture of A. P. NICHOLS, Esq., before the Young Men's Association, on The Golden Age. It will be followed in two or three weeks more, by Mr. CLINTON'S Address before the Erie County Agricultural Society, delivered at its annual meeting last September.—Though a copy was early requested, it was not till lately that Mr. C. consented to have it appear in print.

The following communications are accepted:—The Lily and the Brook, Birth-Day Sonnet, and I was Happy Once.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for May, republished by Leonard Scott & Co., has already appeared. It contains The Caxtons, (Part II.) Education in Wales, The Silver Cross, Heigh-Ho. Republican France, The Spaniard in Sicily, Crimea and Remarkable Trials in Scotland, An Irish Tale, The Last Walk, Man is a Featherless Biped, & The Revolutions in Europe.

SOUTHERN LITERARY GAZETTE.—The first number of a weekly imperial quarto, bearing the above title, lies before us. It is published at Athens, Geo., and is edited by W. C. RICHARDS. Esq., a young gentleman of fine literary taste, with whose writings we have been conversant for the last eight or ten years. The Gazette looks well.

FROM MEXICO.—New Orleans papers of the 11th announce the arrival of the schooner Athos, from Vera Cruz, with advices two days later.—The news, however, is almost nil. The quorum was yet wanting in the Mexican Congress. Three of the Senators had resigned. There was even some doubt whether the Congress would meet at all.

From Tampico we have a little later intelligence. It was rumored there that a quorum of the Mexican Congress had been assembled at Queretaro, but the rumor was considered rather doubtful. Lieut. J. BOWMAN, of the 7th Regt., died at Tampico, on the 6th, of fever, which is said to be quite prevalent. An American named TOWERS was murdered near Matamoros recently by Mexican servants whose object was robbery, and who escaped with their booty.

Foreign News.

The French National Assembly on the 5th inst. declared in the name of the French people, and in the face of the entire world, that the Republic proclaimed on the 24th of February, 1848, is, and shall remain the form of the Government of France.

The fearful conflicts in Cracow is partly confirmed by the accounts received by the Hermann. The people erected barricades and fought manfully, but were finally forced to give way before the disciplined troops of the Autocrat. The city was not, however, conquered till after a severe bombardment, when the citizens finally capitulated.—Ten of the soldiers were killed and 14 wounded.

☞ A sad accident occurred at H. P. DARROW'S Elevator on Monday evening. Two Irishmen, while engaged in loading a canal boat were drawn into the conductor or pipe which conveys the grain from the bin. One of them had his clothes torn from him and was smothered, before he could be extricated. The other was rescued by knocking a hole through the bin and drawing the grain off, and is out of danger. The accident was the result of carelessness, or thoughtlessness on the part of the men, in entering the bin, when there was about 3000 bushels of wheat, and which was rushing out with great rapidity.—*Com. POVERTY OF GUIZOT.—A London letter to the New York Literary World, states that GUIZOT and his family are now in London, actually in a state of destitution.

Arrival of the Caledonia.

New York, May 22—10 P. M.

The Caledonia arrived off Boston on Saturday evening and anchored. A thick fog came up next morning, the news came over the wires with much interruption on account of atmospheric electricity.

The Liverpool Market yesterday closed sluggishly. The chief alteration was in Meal, the demand for which proved extremely dull. There was a marked improvement in the Cotton market, the principal improvement being in low and middling qualities.

London money market opened with appearances of much firmness, but owing to apprehensions of French interference against the army of Austria now in Italy, they closed at a decline of ¼ per cent. Consols are 83¼.

There have been two failures in London of considerable amount—Messrs. Leys, Mason & Co., flax spinners, and Alexander Hadden & Sons, worsted spinners. The mills of both houses are in Aberdeen. The unsettled state of Continental trade is assigned as the immediate cause of these disasters.

Wilmer & Smith says the French elections are now complete, and notwithstanding the utmost exertions of the ultra Republicans and Communists to effect their purpose, the lists exhibit triumphant testimony to the popularity of the principles propounded and acted upon by Lamartine and the moderate party. So clearly and prominently has this expression of popular feeling been manifested, some fears are entertained of the minority resorting to ulterior measures, in order to render part of the proceeding nugatory.

Yucatan—The Treaty of Peace.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

The Tribune supplies the following translation (from the New Orleans Patria) of the convention or treaty agreed upon between the Maya Indians of Yucatan and the White or Spanish inhabitants:

The General Secretary of the Government:

In the holy name of God the Father, of God the Son, and of God the Holy Ghost, Amen. We the undersigned, D. Jose Canuto Vela, curate, and D. Felipe Rosado, superior political chief, commissioned by his Excellency, the Governor D. Miguel Barbachano; and we who are named in the same capacity by the principal chief of the Indians, D. Jacinto Pat, and whose names are likewise undersigned, Pbro, D. Manuel, Mesa Vales and Captains D. Jose Maria Pat, D. Francisco Cob, D. Pantaleon Uh, D. Juan Justo Yam, and the sub-lieutenants D. Jacinto Mangas and D. Juan Jose Guerrero, being met in this town of Tzucacab, on the 19th day of April, of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, for the important purpose of maturely considering whatever may be adopted to put an end to a war which occasions damage, prejudice and ruin on both sides, here in the peninsula of Yucatan, in which our Lord God desired that we might be born to love each other with equality; and considering all that concerns the well-being and profit of our neighbors, the Christians, to the end that they may repose, retiring to the care of their interests, their firesides and their respective families, as is the command of God. Here, before His Majesty, the above mentioned chief D. Jacinto Pat being present, and the Captains D. Apolinario Zel, D. Petro Baak, D. Jose Benito Vitorin, D. Juan May, D. Saturnio Rodriguez, D. Francisco Sanchez, D. Juan Jacinto Pat, and D. Doroteo Poot, of common accord, we have set our names and seals, for perpetual memory, to the true desires or resolutions which follow:

Art. 1. From this day and forever personal taxes shall be abolished both for whites and Indians, it being well understood that the tax here spoken of is that established by law for all Yucatecos from the ages of sixteen to sixty.

Art. 2. In the sense of the preceding article the duty on baptism shall be fixed at three reals, (three shillings, York) and the duty on marriage ten reals, for the whites as well as for the Indians, and for every Yucateco.

Art. 3. It is also established that forests may be cleared for sowing, or to form ranches in the plains of the towns, in lands called lands of community and in common, without paying any rent therefor; and that from this time forth no portion of said lands shall be sold. And those which are claimed and laid out, but the deeds of which have not been executed by the Government, shall remain unconveyed, a recourse for subsistence for the people, the Government undertaking to refund the value which it has received on account of the said lands.

Art. 4. There shall be returned to the Indians under command of the chief, D. Jacinto Pat, all the muskets, which the Government now ceasing have ordered to be taken from them, it being understood that of the two thousand five hundred taken, those which are now existing shall be promptly returned; and that his excellency, the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, shall presently buy as many as are wanting, and shall deliver them into the hands of the said chief, D. Jacinto Pat, that he may distribute them to their owners as is just. All the arms which our beloved neighbors the Indians now have shall remain with them for their use. The moveables and other effects which the troops of the said chief, D. Jacinto Pat, have taken, up to the present time, they shall retain for their own, and no one shall ever have a right to reclaim them.

Art. 5. Considering that his Excellency the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, is alone charged with he execution of the articles of this great act, and also that he alone will have as a duty the fulfilment of their spirit; he is to remain invariably established in the high office which he exercises by the will of the people of this state of Yucatan; and he shall retain it for life, because that has been a cause of taking up arms; and the people shall take care that he be not removed from his station.

ART. 6. It is henceforth established under a sacred compromise that the chief, D. Jacinto Pat, shall be the Governor of the captains of the Indians of the people of Yucatan, and this gentleman will agree with his Excellency the Governor, D. Miguel Barbachano, in the best mode of Government under which internal harmony of the two people may be attained, and as to the manner in which they shall be ruled or governed by their justices for their uniform well-being.

ART. 7. Likewise all debtors to manual service shall be released from their debts, and all those who have assisted in the field with arms in their hands as well as those who have not taken up arms, being included in this provision, since all Yucatecos ought to enjoy this benefit. But those who may desire to contract new debts shall be held to satisfy such debts with their personal labor.

ART. 8. All taxes on the distillation of ardent spirits are abolished in all the towns of Yucatan.

ART. 9. When his Excellency the Governor, D Miguel Barbachano, shal, deposit with his secretary the ratification of the stipulations contained in the present instrument, so that it has the necessary value, all the belligerent forces shall alike retire to their residences, only those troops remaining which are necessary to care for good order in their respective towns, and for the re-establishment of peace and tranquility therein. These agreements are established by the commissioners of his Excellency, D Miguel Barbachano, and of the chief, D. Jacinto Pat, together with their secretaries, &c., &c.

This is remarkable document, suggesting various considerations of moment. In the first place, it completely negatives the current assertion that the Maya of Yucatan are a race of ignorant, ferocious and bloodthirsty savages; for it may well be doubted whether any of the most civilized people in existence, standing as these Maya do in the attitude of conquerors, vastly superior in numbers, in courage and millitary aptitude, and flushed with recent success in numerous conflicts, would accede to an arrangement so strongly marked with both equity and moderation. It is perfectly clear that their chiefs at least—the acting negotiators—have a very good understanding of their natural rights and of what is best, not only for their own interest, but for the interest of the whole population, the whites as well as the aborigines.

Secondly, there is apparently a strong significance in the provisions of the fifth article. It has reached us, from time to time within the last year or two, that discord prevailed between parties of the Spanish population; insurrectionary movements have occurred both at Campeachy and Merida, having for their object the expulsion of Senor Barbacheno from the chief magistracy.—Now it appears that his confirmation in that office for life is one of the conditions stipulated by the insurgent Maya, and the inference therefore seems natural that the recent hostilities have not been exclusively of the Maya against the whites; that the Maya have at last been instigated if not aided or guided by one faction of the whites, the adherents of Senor Barbacheno.

Finally, it seems to be a rational deduction from the apparent confidence mutually placed by the respective parties in the good faith of the other—evidenced by the absence of guarantees other than verbal, and of all allusion to such frightful atrocities and massacres as have been reported—that the accounts which have reached us were greatly and grossly exaggerated; as would naturally be the case, supposing the authors of those accounts to be terrified refugees, stimulated as well by party animosity as by fear of a common enemy.—Mr. Stephens, if we remember rightly, gives a highly favorable account of Senor Barbacheno, in point of intelligence as well as of integrity and good intentions. It is hardly to be supposed that such a man, as the leader of a large party in the nation, would enter into such a compact as that contained in the treaty, with a mere horde of ferocious savages, their hands yet reeking with the blood of murdered thousands, men, women and children.

The natural or probable conclusion seems to be that the actual course of events in Yucatan has been properly a civil war between two parties of the Spanish population, in which finally one party has induced the aboriginal population to take part. We have only to suppose, in conclusion, that Senor Sierra, the commissioner sent to Washington to solicit aid, is in fact the agent, not of the whole Spanish population, but of the defeated or anti-Barbacheno party, and we have not only a key to a right understanding of the whole matter, but also the means of duly estimating the singular good fortune that has brought about a satisfactory adjustment of the affair just in time to save our Government from the great error of taking sides in the controversy, and thus involving itself in a course of unjust as well as unfortunate and dangerous policy.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, May 18.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice, that he should move tomorrow to take up the Wisconsin bill.

Mr. JOHNSON's resolutions in relation to the nomination of military officers not submitted to the Senate, was then taken up.

Mr. ALLEN spoke against the measure. It was not only useless, but contrary to respect due the President. The resolution was lost.

The Senate went into Executive session, when the doors were opened it was voted that the Senate should adjourn from Monday to Thursday next.

HOUSE.—Little business of moment was transacted in the House today. The P. O. bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and COCKE of Tennessee, made a speech against the administration and in favor of the Whigs.

He said that Mr. POLK had rewarded the members of the Convention that nominated him, to the tune of over $700,000. and he read a list of the fortunate parties.

A discussion on sundry amendments to the bill followed, after which the committee rose and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 19.

SENATE.—It was, on motion, decided that when the Senate adjourns, it should do so until Monday next.

Mr. Dix of N. Y. from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill in favor of permitting Spanish steamers to land passengers and mails in our ports without paying tonnage duties, which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, when it was read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dix also reported a bill from the same Committee in favor of authorizing the issuing of Registers to Howard & Sons' Spanish steamers, which was read a second and third time and passed.

Mr. Atherton, Chairman of the Committee on Finance, moved to take up the Appropriation bill for the West Point Academy, which was agreed to, when Mr. Atherton offered an amendment to the bill in favor of appropriating two thousand dollars for the payment of the expenses of the Board of Visiters. The bill as amended was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. Bright of Ind. moved to take up the bill for the admission of Wisconsin as a State into the Federal Union, which was agreed to.

The bill was then, after a brief consideration, read the second and third time and passed.

The Senate then, on motion, proceeded to the consideration of private bills, several of which were taken up, considered, and passed.

Senate adjourned over till Monday.

House.—Mr. Haskell of Tenn. moved to take up the bill in favor of paying the Macedonian's expenses, but the motion was lost.

Mr. Rockwell of Conn. moved that the House re-establish itself as a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed in the consideration of the regular order of business, which was adopted, when the House went into Committee of the whole, Mr. Simms of S. C. in the chair.

The private calender was taken up. Hodges's slave case came up first.

Mr. Chapman of Md. advocated the bill—while Mr. Tuck of N. H. and Mr. Dickey opposed it.—Mr. Rhett of S. C. advocated the passage of the bill.

The debate was very animated to-day and brought out some of the best talents of the House. Among the speakers were Mr. Stephens of Ga., Mr. Garnet Duncan of Ky. and others.

Mr. Stephens made an animated and exciting speech in favor of the rights of the South and the preservation of the Union, which quite electrified the House.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House without amendments, when it was read a third time and passed.

On motion, the House then adjourned over till tomorrow, Saturday.

Strong Wines.—Wines, the stronger they be, the more lees they have when they are new.—Many boys are muddy-headed till they be clarified with age, and such afterwards prove the best.—Bristol diamonds are both bright and squared and pointed by nature, and yet are soft and worthless; whereas orient ones in India are rough and rugged naturally. Hard, rugged, dull natures of youth, acquit themselves afterwards the jewels of their country, and therefore their dulness at first is to be borne with, if they be diligent. That schoolmaster deserves to be beaten himself, who beats nature in a boy for a fault.—Fuller, A. D. 1680.

Clairvoyance to be Legally Investigated—The discovery of the body of young Bruce at Boston, by means of clairvoyance, which was recently declared a humbug, is about becoming the subject of legal investigation. The father of the missing youth has testified to the circumstances of finding the body—his certainty that it was that of his son—the fact that Miss Freeman, the clairvoyant, mentioned, and other singular circumstances relative to the vault, and his belief that his son was murdered, as the clairvoyant states. He is determined to ascertain whether the assertions of the clairvoyant in regard to the guilty parties can be substantiated.—Troy Whig.

From Jamaica and Port-au-Prince.

The schooner Stranger, Capt. Tobey, arrived yesterday from Kingston, having sailed thence on the 30th ult.

As the Stranger was coming out of port she met a schooner bound in, having on board 140 refugees from Port-au-Prince. Our last accounts from Port-au-Prince represented that the news from France had caused great excitement there; now we have the results. The following is from the Jamaica Despatch of the 20th ult:

Hayti.—This unfortunate country has again become the arena of a sanguinary scene. We learn from respectable authority that the black population have risen en masse against the inhabitants of color, and were committing awful ravages among them. The cause of the outbreak we are unable to ascertain, but it is supposed to be a dissatisfaction of the browns to be governed by the present President. The British merchants resident at Port-au-Prince engaged the brig Queen Victoria, which happened fortunately to be there, and sent, through the British consul, to the Commodore on this station, requesting the immediate presence of a man-of-war to protect British subjects and their interests. There was a French vessel of war at Port-au-Prince, and we are informed that her presence tended in a great degree to quell the outbreak which took place, but which, notwithstanding, was of a most serious nature.

The Queen Victoria anchored at Morant Bay on Thursday last, and the captain forthwith came to Port Royal to deliver his despatches to the Commodore. It was said that the number of perrons killed in one day exceeded two hundred.

The Commodore, we learn, has been unable to comply with the requision of her Britannic Majesty's consul at Port-au-Prince, there not being a single vessel of war at Port Royal at this moment, except the guard and store ships, which are useless in their present state.—N. O. Picayune, 12th inst.

Chinese Agriculture.—If there be one thing that the genius of this extraordinary people has brought nearer to perfection than another, it is the cultivation of the soil. The economy of their agriculture is beautiful; the whole country presents the appearance of one continued garden; no large commons starving a few miserable horses, nor parks nor chases laid waste for the special purpose of breeding rabbits, are to be met with; the land is meant to feed and clothe the people, and to that use its powers are directed. Not an inch of soil is lost that can be made useful for the most laborious and apparently unpromising industry, save only such parts as are set aside for burial grounds. Swamps are drained by canals, which carry the superfluous waters where they are turned to profitable account in enriching land that otherwise would not be productive. Hills are terraced to the summits, and the banks of rivers and shores of the sea recede and leave flourishing farms to reward the enterprise of man. I know nothing that would be likely to be more valuable from this country than the report of an experienced and scientific farmer, could such be induced to bestow a short time in travelling to China and making its agriculture his study.—Forbes's China.

A Girl Kidnapped.—A girl, 13 or 14 years of age, was stolen from Nashville, Tenn., by Dr, John Crockett and Lucinda Crockett, with an intention, it is thought, of sailing for Europe. The kidnapped child was the ward of M. W. Brown, Esq., of Nashville, and said to be "very rich." A reward of a thousand dollars, and all expenses paid, is offered for her return. She will answer to the name of Mary McNeil.

THE STRICKEN HEART.

Songs for the young, the pure;
The dance for the gay, the free;
But what will ye give to the stricken heart:
What will ye give to me?

Tears, and sighs, and sorrow?
Ah, no, this must not be!
Ye shall not chase one smile away,
One single smile for me.

Ye shall give me only flowers,
The frailest that ye see:
Pity alone, and wither'd flowers,
Shall be your gifts to me.

SPECTACLES FOR A PRINTER.—The Cairo Delta says, "Our pressman can look out of a window into three States, Missouri, Kentucky and Illinois, and at the rolling floods of two of the mightiest rivers in the West! And he can see steamers from almost every direction, and from all the prominent rivers of the West—some boats that have come nearly a thousand miles and whose point of destination is still more than a thousand miles distant! He sees their decks crowded with people from every quarter of the globe—families of emigrants in search of homes in the 'far West,' business men, traveling men, sporting men mingled together. He can mark the emptying of the great reservoir of Western produce by fleets of puffing steamboats and floating flats, and the returning riches of other climes. He can look abroad into the mighty forests, where but a few years back the foot of white man never trod, and around him at those great manifestations of human genius that the Indian never dreamed of. He can spread abroad his arms among all this greatness and beauty, and himself be the most wonderful object in the multitude—for he is the man who prints the papers!"

THE LUNGS.—On examination the lungs will be found full of innumerable little holes, like a sponge. These holes are the cells into which the air enters when we breathe. So great is their number that they have been calculated to amount to 174,000,000, forming altogether a surface thirty times greater than that of the human body. Every one of these cells is provided with a net-work of blood vessels, by means of which the blood is brought into immediate contact with the air over every portion of their surface. When this great amount is taken into consideration, we shall feel at once how necessary it is to supply pure air to the lungs with every breath we draw.—Health of Towns Gazette.

Mr. Adams was once asked what he most lamented in his life. He answered—"My impulsive temper and vituperative manner of speech, which prevents me from returning good for evil, and induces me, in the madness of my blood, to say things that I am afterwards ashamed of."

MR. WHEATON.—A late number of the London Times, in an article upon the Schleswig question, quotes the opinion of the late Henry Wheaton, "a name," says the Times, "which we cannot mention without a passing tribute to the character, the learning, and the virtues of a man who as a great international lawyer, leaves not his like behind."

CONGRESS.—The Senate was not in session Saturday. In the House nothing was done besides passing the bill authorizing the purchase of the Madison papers.

I Was Happy Once.

I was happy once; and the flying hours
As they passed, o'er my pathway scattered flowers;
Every thought was clad in joy's array,
And life in gladness hastened away.

I was happy once; there was one whose smile
From every care could my heart beguile;
And my spirit bowed, and she came to be
The star of love's idolatry!

I was happy once; for the future was bright,
As a morn in Eden with love's own light;
But clouds will steal o'er the clearest skies,
And the one I loved was another's prize.

I was happy once; but the time has passed—
That time too rapturous long to last;
And my soul is sad, and I often sigh,
As I think of the days which have long gone by!

Mrs. General Gaines.

As the case of this extraordinary woman (Mrs. Gaines) has for a long time past excited the interest of the people of this country, we think it will not be uninteresting to give our readers a slight sketch of her early life.

Mira Clark, now Mrs. Gaines, who is well known to our citizens, having in early life resided here, was born in New Orleans, her father, Daniel Clarke, (well known in the political and commercial history of Louisiana,) being a partner of Col. Davis, of this county. Her father died, and when only a few months old, she was adopted by Colonel Davis, and brought up as his own child. A man by the name of Ralph destroyed her father's will, and obtained possession of the whole of the immense property of her father, consisting of nearly the whole of the new part of New-Orleans,) at that time worth five millions of dollars and now worth much more.) She lived in entire ignorance of her parentage for a long time. The first idea she had of her parentage, was being taunted by a girl at school with the fact that Col. Davis was not her father. Afterwards, she discovered it from some papers which she found, while looking for some documents which she was to send to the Colonel at Harrisburgh—they at that time living in Pennsylvania. Some time afterwards, she visited the Sulphur Springs, Virginia, and while there, on account of her carriage breaking, she became acquainted with a young man named Wm. Whitney, a son of Gen. Whitney, of New-York. Soon afterwards he visited her in Philadelphia, but the Colonel not approving of the match, he was forbid the house. Colonel Davis soon after moved to Delamore, a place near Wilmington, and Miss Clark not being permitted to see her lover she corresponded with him.

To prevent detection, her letters were directed to Miss Mary Ann Williamson, (now the wife of Rev. Cory Chambers, of this city,) daughter of our late Mayor and Postmaster, she carefully keeping the secret, and punctually delivering the letters into the hands of Miss Clark, and sending hers to Mr. Whitney in return. Miss Clark was by this time fully acquainted with her parentage and the immense estate of her father. At last, she received a letter from Mr. Whitney, urging her by all she held true, and the love she bore him, to elope with him. The plan was laid, and the time fixed. Mr. Whitney was to be at Newcastle, where she was to join him. None was let into the secret but Miss Williamson. To prevent detection, Miss Clark called all the dogs together about Col. Davis's place, that evening, put them in one of the out-buildings, and locked them all up. At last the night came, and a terrible one it was, too; the wind howled, the rain poured in torrents, and the darkness was only now and then illuminated by fearful flashes of lightning. Undaunted by the raging elements, Miss Clark stepped from her bed-room on the balcony, and by means of the pillar of the balcony or a rope, managed to reach the ground in safety, and immediately ran as fast as she could to Wilmington.—It was a fearful night for a girl so small, so young and delicate, to venture abroad, alone and unattended. On her way, if possible, the rain became heavier, and the flashes of lightning more vivid.

At last she reached the residence of Mr. Williamson, drenched with rain, and the top of her band-box beat in by the violence of the storm.—Miss Williamson was waiting alone in the passage to receive her; the low knock at the door was given, the key softly turned, the door opened, and Miss Clark, pulling off her little kid slippers, which were wet through, softly ascended the stairs, so as not to alarm the rest of the family. The ladies employed themselves until morning, in drying, as well as they were able, Miss Clark's clothes.

At the first dawn of morning they stepped out, and a hack being procured, she departed for Newcastle. Miss Williamson gave her all the money she had, $5, as at the time she left Col. Davis's she had not a dollar.

At Newcastle, Miss Clark met her lover, and they started for Baltimore, where they were met by Miss Williamson, who acted as bridesmaid on the occasion of their marriage. Immediately after her marriage, Miss Clark, whom we shall now call Mrs. Whitney, set about hunting up facts in relation to her birth. Threats were used, and every obstacle made use of to prevent her. Her first care was to find her mother, and after a long search, she was at last discovered, we believe, in the Island of Jamaica. She almost immediately recognized her daughter, and gave the marriage certificate of her husband, Daniel Clark, from whom she had been separated some time before his death. Proceedings were immediately commenced, but for a short while with a small prospect of success. Threats were not only made against herself and husband, but against any one who should advocate their cause. It was with difficulty a lawyer could be procured to plead her cause; even the very judges on the bench were the feed counsel of the other side, and generally supposed to be under the influence of bribery.

Finally, her husband was thrown into prison, during the prevalence of the fever, and afterwards she was imprisoned with him, with a small child at her breast. Whitney soon died; not, however without strong suspicion of foul play. She afterwards was released, and though a widow, still prosecuted her suit with determined resolution.—So glaringly was the partiality of the judges once displayed, that the crowd in court could hardly contain their indignation. Her life was two or three times attempted. Her first acquaintance with Gen. Gaines was when she was fired at, and part of her dress shot away. Gen. Gaines came and offered her his protection, and she soon after married him. Her opponents dared not use the same means with a general in the U S. army as they had already done with her first husband, a private individual.

After going through so many courts, we now learn that the suit has been decided in her favor. The value of the property is now near twenty millions of dollars. Mrs. Gaines is now about forty years of age, about five feet high, has a sweet expression of countenance, rather a French cast.—She has, at the same time, an indomitable resolution, as every circumstance of her life has shown. She is very charitable and warm hearted, and never forgets her old friends. She, even now, remembers with gratitude the services of her early friend, (formerly Miss Williamson.) now Mrs. Chambers, and assures her when she comes into her estate, she will remunerate her for her former kindness.

Letters from the Alleghany Mountains.

Correspondence of the National Intelligencer.

Tallulah Falls, Ga., April 29, 1848.

The subject of my present letter is Adam Vandever, "the Hunter of Tallulah." His fame reached my ears soon after arriving at this place, and, having obtained a guide, I paid him a visit at his residence, which is planted directly at the mouth of the Tallulah chasm. He lives in a log cabin, occupying the centre of a small valley, through which the Tallulah river winds its wayward course. It is completely hemmed in on all sides by wild and abrupt mountains, and is one of the most romantic and beautiful nooks imaginable. Vandever is about sixty years of age, small in stature, has a regular built weasel face, a small grey eye, and wears a long white beard. He was born in South Carolina, spent his early manhood in the wilds of Kentucky, and the last thirty years of his life in the wilderness of Georgia. By way of a frolic, he took a part in the Creek war, and is said to have killed more Indians than any other white man in the army. In the battle of Ottassee alone, he is reported to have sent his rifle-ball through the hearts of twenty poor heathen, merely because they had an undying passion for their native hills, which they could not bear to leave for an unknown wilderness. But Vandever aimed his rifle at the command of his country, and of course the charge of cold-blooded butchery does not rest upon his head. He is now living with his third wife, and claims to be the father of over thirty children, only five of whom, however, are living under his roof, the remainder being dead or scattered over the world. During the summer months he tills, with his own hand, the few acres of land which constitute his domain. His live stock consists of a mule and some half dozen goats, together with a number of dogs.

On inquiring into his forest life, he gave me, among others, the following particulars: When the hunting season commences, early in November, he supplies himself with every variety of shooting materials, steel-traps, and a comfortable stock of provisions, and, placing them upon his mule, starts for some wild region among the mountains, where he remains until the following spring. The shanty which he occupies during this season is of the rudest character, with one side always open, as he tells me, for the purpose of having an abundance of fresh air. In killing wild animals he pursues but two methods, called "fire-lighting" and "still hunting." His favorite game is deer, but he is not particular, and secures the fur of every four-legged creature which may happen to cross his path. The largest number of skins that he ever brought home at one time was six hundred, among which were those of the bear, the black and gray wolf, the panther, the wild-cat, the fox, the coon, and some dozen other varieties. He computes the entire number of deer that he has killed in his lifetime at four thousand.

When spring arrives, and he purposes to return to his valley home, he packs his furs upon his old mule, and, seating himself upon the pile of plunder, makes a bee-line out of the wilderness. And, by those who have seen him in this homeward-bound condition, I am told that he presents one of the most curious and romantic pictures imaginable. While among the mountains, his beast subsists upon whatever it may happen to glean in its forest rambles, and, when the first supply of his own provisions is exhausted, he usually contents himself with wild game, which he is often compelled to devour unaccompanied with bread or salt. His mule is the smallest and most miserable looking creature of the kind that I ever saw, and glories in the name of "The Devil and Tom Walker." When Vandever informed me of this fact, which he did with a self-satisfied air, I told him that the first portion of the mule's name was more applicable to himself than to the dumb beast; whereupon he "grinned horribly a ghastly smile," as if I had paid him a compliment. Old Vandever is an illiterate man, and when I asked him to give me his opinion of President Polk, he replied: "I never seed the Governor of this State; for, when he came to this country some years ago, I was off on 'tother side of the ridge, shooting deer. I voted for the General, and that's all I know about him." Very well! and this, thought I, is one of the freemen of our land, who help to elect our rulers!

On questioning my hunter friend with regard to some of his adventures, he commenced a rigmarole narrative, which would have lasted a whole month had I not politely requested him to keep his mouth closed while I took a portrait of him in pencil. His stories all bore a strong family likeness, but were evidently to be relied on, and proved conclusively that the man knew not what it was to fear. As specimens of the whole, I will outline a few. On one occasion he came up to a large gray wolf, into whose head he discharged a ball. The animal did not drop, but made its way into an adjoining cavern and disappeared. Vandever waited awhile at the opening, and as he could not see or hear his game, he concluded that it had ceased to breathe, whereupon he fell upon his hands and knees, and entered the cave. On reaching the bottom, he found the wolf alive, when a "clinch fight" ensued, and the hunter's knife completely severed the heart of the animal. On dragging out the dead wolf into the sunlight, it was found that his lower jaw had been broken, which was probably the reason why he had not succeeded in destroying the hunter.

At one time, when he was out of ammunition, his dogs fell upon a large bear, and it so happened that the latter got one of the former in his power, and was about to squeeze it to death.—This was a sight the hunter could not endure, so he unsheathed his huge hunting-knife and assaulted the black monster. The bear tore off nearly every rag of his clothing, and in making his first plunge with the knife he completely cut off two of his own fingers instead of injuring the bear. He was now in a perfect phrenzy of pain and rage, and in making another effort succeeded to his satisfaction, and gained the victory. That bear weighed three hundred and fifty pounds.

On another occasion he had fired at a large buck near the brow of a precipice some thirty feet high, which hangs over one of the pools in the Tallulah river. On seeing the buck drop, he took it for granted that he was about to die, when he approached the animal for the purpose of cutting its throat. To his great surprise, however, the buck suddenly sprung to his feet and made a tremendous rush at the hunter with a view of throwing him off the ledge. But what was more remarkable, the animal succeeded in its effort, though not until Vandever had obtained a fair hold of the buck's antlers, when the twain performed a summerset into the pool below. The buck made its escape, and Vandever was not seriously injured in any particular. About a month subsequent to that time he killed a buck, which had a bullet wound in the lower part of its neck, whereupon he concluded that he had finally triumphed over the animal which had given him the unexpected ducking.

But the most remarkable escape which old Vandever ever experienced happened on this wise.—He was encamped upon one of the loftiest mountains in Union county. It was near the twilight hour, and he had heard the howl of a wolf. With a view of ascertaining the direction whence it came, he climbed upon an immense boulder-rock, (weighing perhaps fifty tons,) which stood on the very brow of a steep hill side. While standing upon this boulder he suddenly felt a swinging sensation, and to his astonishment he found that it was about to make a fearful plunge into the ravine half a mile below him. As fortune would have it, the limb of an oak tree drooped over the rock; and, as the rock started from its tottlish foundation, he seized the limb, and thereby saved his life. The dreadful crashing of the boulder as it descended the mountain side came to the hunter's ear while he was suspended in the air, and by the time it had reached the bottom he dropped himself on the very spot which had been vacated by the boulder. Vandever said that this was the only time in his life when he had been really frightened; and he also added, that for one day after this escape he did not care a finger's snap for the finest game in the wilderness.

While on my visit to Vandever's cabin, one of his boys came home from a fishing expedition, and on examining his fish I was surprised to find a couple of shad and three or four striped bass or rock-fish. They had been taken in the Tallulah, just below the chasm, by means of a wicker net, and at a point distant from the ocean at least two hundred and fifty miles. I had been informed that the Tallulah abounded in trout, but I was not prepared to find salt-water fish in this remote mountain wilderness.

Since I have introduced the above youthful Vandever to my readers, I will record a single one of his deeds, which ought to give him a fortune, or at least an education. The incident occurred when he was in his twelfth year. He and a younger brother had been gathering berries on a mountain side, and were distant from home about two miles. While carelessly tramping down the weeds and bushes, the younger boy was bitten by a rattlesnake on the calf of his leg. In a few moments thereafter the unhappy child fell to the ground in great pain, and the pair were of course in unexpected tribulation. The elder boy, having succeeded in killing the rattlesnake, conceived the idea, as the only alternative, of carrying his little brother home upon his back. And this deed did the noble fellow accomplish. For two long miles did he carry his heavy burden, over rocks and down the water courses, and in an hour after he had reached his father's cabin the younger child was dead; and the heroic boy was in a state of insensibility from the fatigue and heat which he had experienced. He recovered, however, and is now apparently in the enjoyment of good health, though when I fixed my admiring eyes upon him it seemed to me that he was far from being strong, and it was evident that a shadow rested upon his brow.

Household Drudges.—Grace Greenwood confesses recently that she is heartily tired of hearing gentlemen dictate to ladies their duties, and assuring them that their proper place is at the wash tub, and that accomplishments go for naught.—She says:

If the paper wasted in these vain attempts to soft-soap the ladies into washer-women, could be restored to the pristine form, what a fine washing of clothes would be there, my countrywomen!

What could be a more beautiful illustration of womanly dependance and manly courage, than a lady gracefully cleaning handkerchiefs and laces, while her loving lord boldly wrestles with the counterpane and table cloths!

We will darn your stockings for you, gentlemen; we'll hem your handkerchiefs; we'll make your puddings; but while you continue to prefer smoking segars to smoking bacon; mauling each other with hard words in political debates, to the equally gentlemanly, and more useful employment of mauling rails, graciously condescending to pity our weakness—let us dance a little, let us make a little music, and oh! leave us time to read and dress a little. Have compassion, kind sirs. Turn us not into water nymphs and salamanders!

Louisville.—The Journal anticipates a brilliant future for Louisville. It says:

Louisville is the centre of news, of travel, and will soon be of trade. The magnetic telegraph radiates from here, as the common centre, to all the leading places East, West, North, and South. Our regular steam packets are daily increasing from point to point, and the facilities by railroads are soon to be added, bringing into requisition all the vast resources of the surrounding country. As a manufacturing city Louisville can already compete successfully with any other city in the West, and in several branches she far excels all competitors. Her steamboats are the finest and staunchest and by far the fastest on the Western waters.

The growth of the city is most rapid, and our citizens, not content with extending their limits all over the surrounding country, are actually, in the more densely populated districts, taking off the roofs of the buildings and putting on additional stories.

How to Destroy Hawks.—The following ingenious method for destroying these pests to the farmer, is given by S. Webb, Esq., of Waldo Co., (Me.) is a late number of the Belfast Republican Journal:

"Erect a pole, 12 or 15 feet high, in a place where there will not be any thing else near for them to light upon, and upon it set a common fox trap, in which they will alight. A strong rat trap will answer the purpose, by tying it on the pole lengthwise, with the jaws raised above the end, the pole being a little leaning, so that the jaws will not fall together. When one hawk is taken, tie it on the ground near the pole, and its mate will be in the trap in a short time. The season is near for hawks to re-appear, and if farmers do not wish to have their chickens destroyed by them, they will do well to adopt this method of putting a stop to their depredations. Printers in the United States, by giving this an insertion, will circulate valuable information."

Germany.

The great problem of the re-constitution of the German Empire seemed, no doubt, to many of our readers, when first we alluded to it, to be one of the most extraordinary, if not impracticable, schemes of this eventful age, and no man can calculate the progress or the extent of such a revolution in the centre of the Continent of Europe. But in spite of the confusion which has prevailed at Frankfort and the anarchy which has spread with more or less intensity to every part of the Confederation, the plan for the fundamental regeneration of Germany by an Imperial Constitution, has been steadily pursued.

Seventeen Men of Trust—to use the term applied to them by their countrymen—have been sent to Frankfort by different Governments, to assist, if not to supersede, the existing Diet in the preparation of this gigantic scheme. The result of their labors is now complete, and we have before us the proposed Constitution of the German Empire, as it will probably be submitted to the deliberations of the Assembly about to assemble in Frankfort from all parts of the nation.

The territory of the Germanic Confederation, or, to speak more correctly, of the German Empire, is assumed to extend from Istria to Schleswig, including both those provinces, and thus reaching from the Adriatic to the Baltic. It will also include the provinces lately incorporated by Prussia, and extend longitudinally from the Niemen to Saar and the Moselle. As the principal object of this vast revolution is to give unity to the nation, centreing in one political system, all the existing Sovereigns and states of Germany are called upon to surrender a very considerable share of their independence and power.

The relations of Germany with other countries will be conducted, not, as at present, by diplomatic envoys from Prussia, Bavaria, Hanover, Saxony, &c., but exclusively by the universal interests of the nation. The foreign legation in various parts of Germany will, therefore, in like manner cease. The entire military force of this country will in like manner be essentially one, and commanded and administered by the staff of the Empire, and fused into one Imperial army, of which the present national corps will be divisions. So, also, the fortifications and defences of the whole Empire will be placed under the control of the Imperial Government.

It will be proposed that the Head of this Government shall be an Hereditary Emperor of Germany, to be in the first instance elected by the Constituent Assembly to which this Constitution is to be submitted. This Sovereign will govern the Federal concerns of the whole nation, with the advice of responsible Ministers, and the support of a National Parliament consisting of two houses. The Upper House is to be composed of all the present sovereign members of the Germanic Diet, who may sit by deputy, and likewise of a body of Senators, 161 in number, to be men of more than 40 years of age, elected for 12 years and in rotation, with certain qualifications. The Lower House will be chosen from the political Assemblies of each separate German state, in the proportion of one member for every 100,000 inhabitants. These bodies will exercise the powers and enjoy all the rights of Parliament. The seat of Government is proposed to be at Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

But this Constitution contains another institution to which we should be inclined to attribute the highest rank in importance, dignity, and duration. A Supreme and Imperial Court of Judicature is permanently to sit at Nuremberg, composed of 21 members taken from the judicial order in the several states; one-third of these judges being named by the Emperor, and one-third elected by each Chamber of the Diet—the tenure of their office being for life.

The powers of this Court would be extremely vast—more extensive even than those of the Supreme Court of the United States. They would embrace not only the decision of all questions of Federal law, arising between States or individuals, but the determination of political rights, the trial of political impeachments, both of Ministers of the Empire and of the separate states, and a species of political arbitration in cases of dispute between the members of the Empire.

If such a tribunal as that can be founded and maintained with adequate authority, it would place the union of Germany on higher and more solid ground than any purely political institutions which ever sprang out of the fertile brain of a German jurist, or the crater of a liberal revolution.

Of the future no man can speak, and the German Empire still looms indistinctly through the mysteries of the coming time. But we believe it may be affirmed that the first act of the German National Assembly will be to create a temporary Regency, composed of the Archduke John of Austria, a prince of the House of Brandenburgh, and a third member, to be named by Bavaria and the minor German Powers.

Manufacture of Needles.—Needles go thro a number of operations before they are complete. Some commence with steel wire hardened, others harden it afterwards. The wire is first reeled into a coil, which is cut apart in two places with shears, and then drawn a second time, after which it is cut into lengths just sufficient for two needles in one piece. These pieces are then straightened by rolling a bundle of them together upon a hard surface, being afterwards sharpened upon a revolving grindstone. The pieces are now cut in two at the middle, the blunt ends flattened with a hammer, preparatory for the eye, which is afterwards pierced by machinery. They are then polished by plunging them into a bath of melted metal, and immediately after into cold water; then thrown into a wabbler—a barrel rapidly revolving upon an axis not placed in the centre—with emory and a putty made of the oxide of tin, by which they are burnished. They are then taken out and separated by a winnowing apparatus, and put in papers for sale—the quantity not being counted, but regulated by weight. The eye was formerly pierced by children, who became so expert, that with one blow of a punch they would frequently pierce a hole, through which they would thread a hair from the head and hand it to their visitors.

There are but three manufactories in this country, and one of these import them from Europe in a half-finished state, and then finishes them, the European labor being less expensive.

A Rare Sight.—The Messrs. Yates had today in their stable, a rare and interesting spectacle, consisting of eleven full grown camels, accompanied by two stalwart and rather noble looking Arabs, from the deserts of Arabia. The camels were shipped from Alexandria, Egypt, and were purchased of the Pacha, who sent along the two Arabs as their keepers. There were twelve originally, but one died at Sandy Hook, last Sunday morning. They came over in the steamer Hermann, and are designed for some travelling exhibition. They came up the river last night.—Alb. Atlas.

Distribution of Wealth.—The total value of property in Great Britain is estimated at $25,000,000,000, and the annual value of the product at $2,500,000,000. The total value of the property in the United States of America does not exceed $6,000,000,000, and the total annual value of our products is estimated at about $1,200,000,000. If the property of Great Britain were equally divided among the population, it would give nearly $5,000 to every family of five persons: and if the annual income were thus divided, each family would have $500. The same division in the United States would give each family $1,500 of property, and for an annual share of the products, $300.

Lake Superior Items.

From the Cleveland Herald.

The News of the 13th furnishes several matters of interest. Meteorological observations made at Fort Brady for the year ending April 30th, show that the warmest day last year was July 9th, the mercury standing at 96 degrees in the shade—the coldest was the 10th of January, the thermometer indicating 22 degrees below zero.—The aggregate of rain that fell during the year was 32: 33 inches. The greatest depth of snow during the winter was about 30 inches; aggregate not stated. Steamboat navigation closed Nov. 26th, and was resumed on the 26th of April. Navigation was absolutely impracticable only about four months. The writer says:

"On comparing the mean annual temperature of the Saultde Ste. Marie with that of other places on this and the eastern continent, it appears that the climate of our vicinity is milder than that of Quebec or Moscow, and a very little colder than that of Copenhagen and Edinburgh. By comparing the mean temperature of the different seasons of the past year with that of other places, I find that while we have the winter of Montreal and the Spring of St. Petersburgh, we enjoy the summer of London and Paris. About the same amount of rain falls here as as London."

The News speaks in high terms of the accommodations and fare of the Ste Marie Hotel and the Van Anden House, now in readiness for Spring and Summer sojourners at the Sault.

The propeller Independence started up Lake Superior on her first trip of the season, May 8th, with a good load of passengers and freight for Lapointe and the intermediate ports of the South shore.

The steamer Swallow left for Isle Royale and the north shore of the Lake on the 9th.

The steamer Julia Palmer is tied up on the Canada side, a mile or two above the Rapids, by order of Collector Wilson, of Her Majesty's Government, for a violaiion of the British Revenue laws.

The schooner Florence, which sailed on Lake Superior in 1846, and was seized by the Canadian authorities last spring, and condemned for smuggling, is advertised to be sold on the 24th instant.

The steamer Gore is to run on the British route to Lake Superior, via Lake Simco and Owen's Sound, and will make semi-monthly trips between the Sault Ste. Marie, and Toronto. Time of trip about sixty hours. The distance is 450 miles less than the Lake Erie route, and the scenery, for variety, and beauty, is unsurpassed.

The News notices the arrival of a small boat which coasted down from Carp River, loaded with several hundred pounds of bar iron from Jackson Iron Works at that place, and says the schooner Free Trader goes up in a few days for a load. A cargo of Lake Superior iron will be apt to elicit some attention below.

Sir John Richardson and Doctor Rae have left the Sault on their journey overland to the Arctic regions in search of the lost expedition of Sir John Franklin, who sailed from England in 1845, with a view of discovering a North-west passage, and from whom nothing has been heard for more than two years. It is feared that Sir John and his 125 companions are blocked up in the ice, or have perished from cold, starvation, or the scurvy. Dr. King is also to make search for Franklin's party, and he proposes to take the route he took in search of Sir John Ross in 1833–35. He is to reach the Polar Sea across the Continent of America, and thus proceed on his search from land known to the Continent, where every footstep will be so much good work done for the rescue of 126 gallant men, and for the furtherance of geographical and historical knowledge. The expeditions are expected to cost the British Government over £30,000.

The News speaks favorably of the operations of the Ste Marie Company at Pewabec Location, on the Canada side of the river, about six miles below the Sault, and Montreal Mining Company, Bruce Mines. The Montreal Company have purchased the Bruce mines, and extensive preparations are being made for mining operations at that point. A force of 200 men will be employed the coming season. The terms of the Bruce mine purchase were 14,200 shares of the Montreal Company stock, assessable for all future calls, and £33,250 in money. Of the latter, £15,000 is payable by instalments before the 28th of August next, and the balance in six yearly payments with interest. The sale shows something more than fictitious value in the Bruce mines of Lake Huron.

Mr. Robertson, Superintendent of the wealthy British North American Mining Company, took passage for the Company's works on the North shore of Lake Superior, on the Swallow. The Directors have sent to England for an experienced Mining Captain and several Cornish Miners.—They intend to extend their operations on the main shore, and resume their works on Spar Island.

Mr. McCullough, Agent of the Pittsburgh and Isle Royale Mining Company, has arrived at the Sault, with a force of 15 men for mining operations on Isle Royale. The News says operations have been continued through the winter, and the Company now adds additional force under the most flattering prospects.

The Louisville (Ky.) Courier gives the following laughable denouement of temperance celebration near that city last week:

"We hear of rather a ludicrous affair which came off at Shippingsport. The Sons of Temperance had a procession in which a number of ladies joined. After a fatiguing march out, and about, and through the city, they concluded to have a little something to strengthen and sustain the inner man, eschewing strong drink as a matter of course. Lemonade was ordered; the first being none of the best, or the ideas of some of the company not being altogether pleased with its strength and acidal qualities it was farther proposed that a little tartaric acid be added to the beverage. This was accordingly done, and the social glass again went round; but, in a very few moments thereafter every one who had partaken was seized with a sudden vomiting and death-like nausea. Astonishment, and horrid suspicions of poison flashed through the minds of all. Ladies as well as gentlemen were alike afflicted. Precipitation governed every movement, distress was depicted on every countenance, and the utmost consternation prevailed until the contents of the Lemonade cans were examined, and instead of tartaric acid, tartar emetic was found to be the ingredient introduced for improving the flavor of the Lemonade. The mistake occurred in the written prescription sent by a boy to the Portland drug store, which, when produced, read more like tartar emetic than tartaric acid.

A Monster Trout.—Two of our fishermen, Messrs. Slocum and Bliss, caught yesterday, in their nets, some 10 miles from the shore, the largest Trout ever seen in these parts. It measured 3 feet 11 inches in length, 45 in girth, and weighed fifty-five pounds.—Milwaukee Sent.

The Indian War in Oregon.

In the Chicago Journal of Monday last we find the following detailed statement of affairs in Oregon, made by Mr. MEEK who performed a mission to Washington, in behalf of the settlers of that territory.

"When I left Walla Walla, on the 26th day of January, the people of the territory of Oregon, were at open war with four tribes of Indians—the Cayuse, Walla Walla, Shaster and Day Indians. Four battles had taken place between them before I left the country: the first engagement took place at the foot of the Dalles of the Columbia, on the 8th of January, between a small party of troops under the command of Capt. Lee—the next took place sometime after between the advanced guard of the Oregon Regiment under the command of Major Lee. He was forced to retreat, with very little loss, and fall back upon the regiment.

Next day, the regiment marched up the Shaster river, under the command of Col. C. Gilliam. About 12 o'clock, they were attacked by a large body of Indians, but they were soon routed by the troops—their villages taken and burned. Large quantities of salmon fish, preserved for food, and other property, were also destroyed.

The Oregon Regiment having been reinforced, so as to number 500 men, they took up a line of march for the Walla Walla. On the 18th of February, the enemy appeared on the plains in great numbers, and a line of battle was formed. The engagement commenced about ten o'clock, and lasted until night parted the combatants. Each party camped on the ground, but next morning the enemy had left the field. A large number of Indians, of other tribes, were present, as lookers on of the strife. It was not known how many of the Indians were killed.—The troops had a nine-pounder with them, mounted on an emigrant's wagon, drawn by six yoke of oxen; the balls gave out during the battle, and they were compelled to shoot away the lock-chains belonging to the baggage-wagons.

Next day, they marched to the Utilla river, and thence to Dr. Whitman's Mission, the scene of the massacre. All the property about the place had been destroyed by the Indians, and the houses burnt.—Here, too, were the heads of the Doctor and of his amiable wife lying in the yard, and the bones of the other sufferers scattered about on the ground. At this point I left the troops, and took the Blue Mountain route, the snow from three to five feet deep, for about thirty miles, until we fell in with the third division of Oregon."

The Journal supplies the following additional particulars, which shows what has been done down to the latest date of advices:

The Governor called the Legislature together, and they passed a law to raise 500 men forthwith.

A resolution was also passed, authorizing the Governor to raise a company of riflemen, to proceed forthwith to occupy the mission station at the Dalles of the Columbia river. This company was immediately formed, and H. A. G. Lee elected Captain, J. Magone, 1st Lieut. and J. E. Ross 2d Lieut. On the 8th a flag was presented to the company by the ladies of Oregon City, and on the same day the command started for the scene of the massacre.

A memorial to Congress was adopted, and Joseph L. Meek, Esq., one of the members from Twalatin county, was appointed the special messenger. The memorial—written by Marcus Ford, Esq.—sets forth the condition of the country in plain terms. It expresses the opinion that the massacre which has been narrated, is only the commencement of further and more extensive murders, and "our hitherto peaceful settlements will become the scene of fierce and violent warfare." "Circumstances," it is said, "warrant your memorialists in believing that many of the powerful tribes inhabiting the upper valley of the Columbia, have formed an alliance for the purpose of carrying on hostilities against our settlements," and aid from the United States is feelingly implored.

Many other subjects are alluded to in the memorial. The action of Congress, extending a Territorial Government over Oregon, is solicited; and in this event, to settle the aspirations for office, already existing in Oregon, it is requested that "important and responsible offices created here—such as Governor and the several judgeships—should be filled by men of the best talent and most approved integrity, without regard to their present locality."

The following persons were massacred by the Indians at Walla Walla: Dr. Whitman, Mrs. Whitman, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Sanders, (schoolmaster,) Mr Marsh; John Sager, Francis Sager, (youths,) Mr. Kimball, Mr. Gellen, Mr. Bewley, Mr. Young, jr., Mr. Sales, Mr. Hall.

STRANGE SUICIDE.—A week or two since, a man named Bruce, living near Cincinnati, O., committed suicide in the following manner:

"He went to the church yard and dug his grave beside his wife who had been buried some sixteen months before. Having procured a coffin under some pretence, he conveyed it to its destination unobserved. He then took off his clothes, except his shirt, put on a night cap, and laid himself in the coffin which he had previously placed in the newly made grave, with a loaded pistol in it. He now drew on the cover of the coffin, and then placing the pistol to his right temple, fired it. It is supposed he died instantly. There is no doubt that Bruce was crazy, as he had been partially so since his wife's death.

OLD MAIDS OF PARIS.—Among the processions of different classes to the Hotel de Ville, to claim the maximum of their rights, and be assured the minimum, was recently noticed a deputation of the old maids of Paris. They promenaded along the quai in virtuous order, and on arriving at their place of destination, respectfully demanded that the arrangements for marriage should be looked into, that every honest woman might receive, at least, her minimum of a husband. The member charged to receive deputations responded, that the matter could not properly become the subject of a special decree; but that the articles wanted belonged to the class of valuable and patriotic gifts.—The procession of the lovely unasked-for then took their way along the quai, crying, occasionally, "Long live the men!"

There is Nothing in Vain.

BY ELIZA COOK.

Oh! prize not the essence of Beauty alone,
And disdain not the weak and the mean in our way,
For the world is an engine—the Architect's own,
Where the wheels of least might keep the larger in play.
We love the fair valley, with bloom in the shade,
We sing of green hills—of the grape and the grain;
But be sure the Creator did well when he made
The stark desert and marsh—for there's nothing in vain.

We may question the locust that darkens the land,
And the snake, flinging arrows of death from its eye;
But remember they come from the Infinite Hand,
And shall man, in his littleness, dare to ask why?
Oh! let us not speak of the "useless" or "vile,"
They seem so to us—but be slow to arraign:
From the savage wolf's cry, to the happy child's smile,
From the mite to the mammoth, there's nothing in vain

There's a mission, no doubt, for the worm in the dust,
As there is for the charger with nost ils of pride;
The sloth and the newt have their places of trust,
And the agents are needed, for God has supplied.
Oh! could we but trace the great meaning of ALL,
And what delicate links form that ponderous chain:
From the dew-drops that rise, to the seas, drops that fall,
We should see but one purpose, and nothing in vain.

MASSACRE AT SEA.—Some of the particulars mentioned in the subjoined article were published at the time of the arrival of the steamer America from Europe. The following is an extract from a letter from a gentleman in the East Indies to a friend in Boston:

* * * The General Wood, a fine ship of 1200 tons, laden with a rich cargo of gums and spices, sailed from Singapore for Penang, on the 2d of January, with 92 Chinese convicts on board, and three passengers—a newly married couple, and a gentleman. While lying at Singapore, the convicts had communication with the secret society, which exists among the Chinese, being a branch of the Triad Society in China, a species of free-masonry, who assisted the convicts, or, as some express it, ordered them to rise.

The ship anchored that night not far from Singapore, and at one o'clock in the morning, the Chinese got loose, and killed the captain, three mates, and forty-seven of the crew. The captain, by his imbecility, seems to have prepared everything most perfectly for their success. The balls were taken from the guns, and the bayonets and pistols locked in a chest, of which he had the key in his pocket. Only two unarmed Lascars kept watch over 92 of the most desperate villains. Six were allowed to go at large, and the captain was applied to that night, by the mate, to lock them up also, but he refused. From the first, little resistance was made; no one seemed to have contemplated the possibility of such an event. The mates were soon killed; the captain, unmanned by terror, retreated into his state-room, fired his pistols at random, and was finally speared and thrown overboard, the passengers were slightly speared, but the lady does not seem to have been molested beyond being locked up.

The convicts then slipped the cable, got the ship under way, and, which is most astonishing, somehow contrived to pass through the straits of Dujon, in sight of Singapore, through most intricate navigation, in the teeth of the north-east monsoon, until on the morning of the 23d, they ran her ashore on Pulo Laut, not far from where the Mary Ellen was lost. They then took to the boats, carrying with them the passengers and part of the crew. The ship soon after sunk, carrying down seven of the convicts. The remainder reached the shore, and were met by four armed Malays. Here the Chinese seemed to have been bewildered, and set out to kill the passengers; but Mrs. Seymour speaking Malay, gave her diamond ring to the Malays, who interfered; and the Chinese probably thinking there were other Malays on the island, suffered her to be rescued with the other passengers. The convicts inquired the way to Siam and China, and forty or fifty pushed off in the long-boat, with no water, and one bag of rice, and have not since been heard of. Communication was had in the morning with the Rajah of Great Natunas, who sent a large force over and captured seventeen of the remainder, in the jungle. In true oriental style, he offered to put them all to death if the passengers wished it; but they forebore, and the convicts were brought to Singapore on the 18th of February, and will probably soon be hanged there.

Mrs. Seymour is a delicate young woman, just married to a Lieutenant in the Bombay cavalry. She seems to have had a miraculous escape.

You may imagine that some excitement is produced at Singapore by this event. A population of only 250 Europeans, among 60,000 Chinese, of whom 1900 are convicts, guarded by only 350 Sepoy soldiers!

SAD AFFAIR.—A stranger, a Frenchman came in town from the east on Wednesday and stopped at Myers', near the railroad. Thursday forenoon he was inquiring of some of his countrymen after work and spoke of feeling sick. After dinner he opened his trunk and taking out an armfull of clothing went through the streets casting it about and in other ways manifesting insanity. Officers Barnes and Donaldson went in pursuit of him and found him kneeling on the steps of the First Presbyterian church apparently praying. He was taken to the watch-house and at first placed in the basement, but was soon removed to a more comfortable room, in the second story. After some time, during which one of his countrymen was sent for to talk with him, he was left alone while the officers went for an order to commit him to the Poorhouse or Asylum. As they reached the watch-house on their return, about 5 o'clock, they saw him on top of the grating which crosses the lower half of the window and in instant more he burst through the sash and cast himself head-foremost upon the pavement. He lived about half an hour.

From his passport dated Rouen, Feb, 14, 1848, and certificates of his employers &c., found upon him, it appears that his name was Marie Vincent Robert, that he was a wagon maker by trade, 27 years of age, and had been a resident of Boruambuse, in the department de la Seine inferieur.—He had with him over $60, mostly in five franc pieces and a trunk full of good clothing. Although evidently out of his head when arrested, his conduct was not so violent as to occasion apprehension of his injuring himself.—Utica Gaz.

SHORT PASSAGE.—NEW ROUTE.—The barque W. H. D. C. Wright, of this port, has made the round voyage to Rio and back, including ten days detention at Rio, in 85 days.

She is believed to be the first vessel that has tried the new route proposed by Lieut. Maury, of the U. S. Navy, on his "wind and current" charts. She passed to the Southward of Bermuda and made the passage to Rio in 38 days, following the great circle and crossing the line 24th day out in lon. 31° W.

The discovery by Lieut. Maury, of a region of better winds along the great circle to Rio is a most important one; for the passage to Rio, China, and all places South of the Equator is shortened some ten to fifteen days.

No vessel should go to sea without these charts. We understand they will be given to any navigator who will send the track of his vessel, with a record of the winds and currents to the Observatory at Washington; and who, upon application to that office, will be supplied with the charts, sailing directions, &c.—Baltimore American.

PINE'S EXECUTION—ANOTHER MURDER.—Extract of a letter, dated

POUGHKEEPSIE, May 26.

Pine was executed today at 12 o'clock. Another case of murder happened yesterday in Pleasant Valley, a few miles east of this place. An Irishman was shot dead by a man of considerable standing, named Divine, a doctor. Divine and his neighbor joined farms, and there was a dispute between them about the line, &c. Divine threatened his neighbor that if he put up the fence so and so, he would shoot the man who did it.—His neighbor set his Irishman at work, and Divine shot him in the presence of one or two witnesses. His case is a clear one, and he will doubtless be hung. This is the first execution we have had in this place in 30 years, and there is now a prospect of having another before long.—Eve. Jour.

To My Child.

BY MRS. E. J. EAMES.

Come back to me, my child! I call the ever,
All the day long I listen for thy voice,—
The ringing laugh that made my heart, rejoice;
I miss it 'midst life's languishment and fever!
For thy blue eyes of love and light I pine,—
Thy twining arms—thy frequent soft caress:
Like balmiest summer, stole thy lips to mine.
Oh! at still eve, my heart how didst thou bless!
Come back, my child! I wander hopeless-hearted
Where'er thy little feet have dancing stray'd;
Sad is the home whence thy sweet face hath parted—
Silent the nursery where thou'st prattling played!
Earth wears for me but one unvarying gloom,
O'ershadowed by the thought that thou art in the tomb!

Come back to me, my child! though but in dreams—
Thine angel-image let me clasp once more!
If haply, o'er my couch still slumber gleams,
The night-time may thy rosy lips restore,—
Thy downy cheek laid lovingly to mine,— Thy sweet "my mother," in thy dreaming sleep—
While thy small arms around me closer twine.
My idol-boy! I wake to weep,
Never again on earth shall I behold thee!
Thou'st left my side, and gone to other rest!
My child! I know the Savior's arms enfold thee,—
I know thou leanest on his pitying breast,
A blessed lot! my child! O, ask for me,
That where thy home is, mine ere long may be!

For the Western Literary Messenger.

The Lily and the Brook.

TRANSLATED FROM THE "LUCTUS PRECORDIE."

A little brook, that day and night, ran cheerfully along through green pastures, within its flower bordered banks, singing its ceaseless harmonies, whether heeded or unheard, seemed to hush its song to a more slow and sacred tone as it entered the still and shaded quiet of a beautiful grove.—It almost seemed to pause and flow with gentler current, as if conscious of the presence of a more sacred influence than it found in the open fields and in the garish sunlight. It received in its placid embrace the shadows of the green and trembling boughs which hung above, and seemed to look down with calm affection upon the beautiful reflection of their own forms. But one bright morning a near and timid face, rising from the low bank of violets, peeped over, and the brook saw a new friend in the half covered face of the lily. It was the only one that had ventured so near, and the brook resolved to make it its special care. It nourished its roots in the fervid heat with abundant moisture, and in the cold dark night sent forth a cloud of vapour to shield it from the killing frost. Day by day the timid lily unfolded more and more of beauty and of grace, and the modest violets looked up with meek and wondering admiration to their stately cousin. It bent gracefully over in sweet professions of gratitude and love to the grateful and rejoicing brook; and when burdened by the dews of night, bent low as if to be sheltered in the bosom of its friend. As for the brook, rejoicing in the lovely being it had so much helped to render lovely, it forgot almost all others, and sang its sweetest songs, and breathed its hushed and holy tones of love around that beautiful and tender flower.

They did indeed seem born to be the companions of their long summer life, and so they said they would be. But one day a wanderer from the heat and bustle of the great city strayed to the shadows of the grove, and sat down on the violet bank where the lily grew. And the lily, accustomed to the admiration of the violets and the grateful praise of the brook—could not resist the temptation to gain another admirer. She lifted her beautiful face, and flaunted in graceful dalliance with the breeze; and employed all arts to gain attention, without seeming to wish it, which lily's know so well to use. The heart-sick wanderer at last observed and admired her beauty—he wished to bear her to his home as a memento of the hour of his release from ever pressing cares; and the lily, forgetting all in her ambition to shine among the gazing city flowers, consented to be removed. The stranger plucked the stem, and bore it away, to fade in one short hour in his grasp. The brook seeing its care and worship thus requited, seemed to breath a wailing tone of grief, of which this is the substance:

Thou faithless, fickle beauty, go.
For now thy honor and thy worth
I have this hour learned to know,
And found thee like the rest of earth,
False to thyself—and false to me,
What have I lost in losing thee?

What have I lost? A pleasant dream,
That hath a horrid waking time,—
A fickle flower that only seemed
The thing I worshipped as my shrine.
But ah, I feel my trust is lost,
I learn to doubt at fearful cost.

What can I trust? What dare to love?
Who seemed so full of truth as thou,
I look around me and above,
But all things seem to mock me know.
I'll hasten onward to the sea,
And there my grief shall buried be.

CURE FOR JELOUSY.—Tht affair of Bruce, who was murdered, and found by the aid of a clairvoyant, according to the accounts, induced a young married man, who was on a visit to the city, to call on one of these seers and ascertain in what occupation his wife was engaged at her residence some ninety miles away.

"She is sitting in the parlor," said the lady, "and every once in a while she looks out of the window as if expecting some one."

"Strange," said the gentleman, "who can she expect?"

"Some one entering the door; she seizes him and caresses him fondly."

"It can't be; it is all a hoax; my wife is true to me," interrupted the gentleman, nettled and worried by the green-eyed monster.

"Now he lays his head in her lap, and looks tenderly into her eyes."

"I swear that it is false, and I'll make you pay dear for this slander."

"Now he wags his tail," continued the sleeper, and as this explained the story, he vamosed, and resolved never again to be inquisitive in regard to his wife's doings.—Boston Gazette.

MANCHESTER, N. H.—Very few persons out of New England are aware of the fact that a regular city of 15,000 inhabitants has lately sprung up in the heart of New Hampshire; and few of those few, probably, are fully conversant with the circumstances of its rise and progress. Where this city was ten years ago, was nothing but a plentiful growth of pitch-pine. The site which it occupies, on the east bank of the Merrimac, was bought up by a manufacturing company of Bostonians, called the Land and Water Company. This company, disposing of a part of its sites for mills, other companies were formed, to number of four or five; among which are the Manchester, the Stark, (so called after Gen. John Stark, of Revolutionary fame whose burial place is here) and the Amoskeag—the mills of which, by way of distinction, are called the Amoskeag New Mills. The number of mills is ten; all of which are of the largest dimensions, and give employment to 4,000 girls, besides men. One of the mills, stopping at the time of our visit, seventy-eight girls left in the cars to spend a few days at their respective homes. We know not whether the plan on which the manufacturing part of the city was built, was a borrowed one or was indigenous with the growth of the city itself. Probably nothing precisely like it exists in this country. Between every two blocks of boarding houses, where is ordinarily a street, are garden plats with a pathway running through them longitudinally with the block, and equally dividing them. while the rears of the same blocks are united to the rears of other blocks; a paved cart way separating in the manner of the garden path. These are built next to the factories on a declivity, while the residences of the towns people occupy the level above. The main street of the town is Elm st., which is a beautiful street, parallel with the river, and about half a mile in length.

The fall of water obtained here is somewhere between 30 and 40 feet; so great that the same water is used twice, viz: by two ducts or canals—the one at a considerable elevation above the other: from which, the mills on it having been accommodated, the water is discharged into the lower and the secondary range of factories supplied.

The width of the Merrimac here is apparently about 80 yards; and this, so far as is to be observed in following it by railroad to Concord, is about average width.

The country about Manchester is hilly, and in a westerly direction mountainous. Three quite large mountains are in fine view; the largest, called the Canoonick, is apparently of 2,000 feet elevation. The smallest elevations are the Dodge and Orr mountains.

PRECOCITY OF INTELLECT.—Having watched the growth of the young a good deal, I am less and less in love with precocity which is indeed, so often a mere manifestation of diseases—the disease of a very fine, but very weak nervous organization. Your young Rosciuses, and all your wonders of that kind generally end in the feeblest of common-place. There is no law, however, precise and absolute in the matter. The difference of age at which men attain maturity of intellect, and even of imagination, is very striking. The tumultuous heat of youth has certainly given birth to many of the noblest things in music, painting and poetry; but no less fine productions have sprung from the ripeness of years. Chatterton wrote all his beautiful things, exhausted all hopes of life, and saw nothing better than death at the early age of eighteen. Burns and Byron did in their thirty-seventh year, and I think the strength of their genius was over. Raphael after filling the world with divine beauty, perished also at thirty-seven; Mozart earlier. These might have produced still greater works. On the other had, Handel was forty-eight before he "gave the world assurance of a man." Dryden came up to London from the provinces, dressed in Norwich drugget, somewhat above the age of thirty, and did not even then know that he could write a line of poetry. Yet what towering vigor and swinging ease all at once in "glorious John!" Milton had, indeed, written his Comus at twenty-six; but blind and "fallen on evil days and evil tongues," he was upward of fifty when he began his great work. Cowper knew not his own might till he was far beyond thirty, and his Task not was written till near his fiftieth year. Sir Walter Scott was also upward of thirty before he published his Minstrelsy, and his greatness was yet to come.—Bird's "Old Bachelor."

FLIGHT OF HORSES.—About the 10th of June, 1810, at two o'clock in the morning, while Col. R. M. Johnson's regiment was encamped on the Peninsula below Fort Wayne, in a beautiful grass plain, some of the horses that had passed the line of sentinels and got some distance up the St. Joseph, became alarmed, and came running into the camp in great fright. This alarmed all the horses in the regiment, which united in a solid column within the lines, and took three courses round the camp. It would seem almost incredible, but it is a fact, they appeared not to cover more than about 40 or 60 yards of ground, and yet their number was about 600. The moon shone at the full, the camp was an open plain, and the scene awfully sublime. They at length forced their passage through the lines, overset several tents, and carried away several pannels of fence, passing off through the woods, and were, in a few minutes out of hearing of the loudest bells that belonged to the regiment. The next day was spent in collecting them, some of which were found 10 or 12 miles from the camp up the St. Joseph, and about 20 or 25 were never found, although pursued above 20 miles. This alarming flight of horses of that regiment injured them more than can be supposed; for they had run so long in a compact body, that very few had escaped without being lamed, having their hind feet cut by the shoes of these that crowded on them. The writer of this was an officer on guard, and then on duty. The night being clear and calm—the moon rolling in full splendor—the flight of the horses, which resembled distant thunder—the idea of an immediate attack from the Indians, and the ground of our encampment being paved with the bones of former warriors, all combined to furnish one of those awfully sublime night scenes that beggar all description. A similar flight of the horses took place about the 22d of June, after the regiment arrived at Fort Meigs.—American Anecdotes.

A VENERABLE TYPO.—There is a printer now residing in Washington who has been setting type, off and on, for 46 years! He was engaged in the last war, fought at the battle of North Point, assisted to establish the independence of Buenos Ayres, Venezuela and Mexico, and hunted the Creek Indians in 1836. He is, according to the Saturday News, as active as ever.

The other day a countryman called on a physician in this city, bringing with him a stout boy, whose robust appearance indicated that he might prove a match for any disorder. The anxious father stated to the doctor that as his son had been disposed to the small pox, he should like to have him ventilated, if it did not cost over half a dollar. —Rochester American.

LIFE INSURANCE.—From the expositions of the doings of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Office, which has just completed its third year, and which we publish today, the public can judge of the great utility of Life Insurance in general, and the success in particular which has attended the operations of this Company. The losses paid have rendered many families comfortable (as the Directors have learned) who would otherwise have been entirely destitute, or else dependent upon kindred or the cold charity of the world. Does not the knowledge of this fact more than repay every person insured for the pecuniary support he has given this benevolent institution? and does it not call loudly upon all who have families dependant upon them, and who have neglected to provide themselves with insurance, to do so at once, that those they love may have something to lean upon when the husbands' and fathers' arm can uphold them no longer? The mutual principle, as carried out by this office, offers to him who is interested in the probable condition of those now dependant upon him, the simplest means of making certain, in a good measure the results of a life of ordinary length.

The advantage of Life Insurance is not merely pecuniary, for there is a great gain on the score of feeling—the heart is made lighter by the knowledge that there is a deposit in the best of Savings Banks, and if a man is taken suddenly and dangerous ill, and sees in the faces of his physicians and friends that his life is almost despaired of, he is saved in that hour from more mental agony and anxiety than all the sacrifice is worth that he has ever laid upon the counter of the Insurance office. Will any person thus situated say he regrets that his life is insured? No! he will tell you it is the duty of every man of family to insure his life with a prospective regard to that "inevitable hour," and to those he will leave behind he will enjoin it upon every such persons, as a duty from which there is no conscientious retreat, to appropriate a part of his yearly earnings to the purchase of the peace and comfort which he is then enjoying.—N. Y. Tribune.

PICTURESQUE HAIR-CUTTING.—An English traveler in Paris having occasion for a haircutter, sent for one. At the appointed time, an elegantly attired person arrived, and the gentleman sat down before his dressing case to prepare for the operation. The man walked around his "client" once or twice, and finally, taking his stand at some distance, attentively scrutinized the gentleman's face with the air of a connoiseur looking at a picture.

"Well," said the Englishman, impatiently, "when are you going to begin?"

"Pardon me, sir," was the polite reply, "I am not the operative, but the physiognomist."—"Adolphe!" he cried out, and a sleeved and aproned barber entered from the hall; "a la Virgil!"

With the laconic direction as to the model after which the gentleman's hair was to be arranged, the artist retired.

A GOOD WIFE.—Oh, it is beautiful to live blameless under the poisoned glance of the world; poisoned, whether it praise or blame; beautiful, not to be polluted by its observation, but more beautiful to be intimately known to one—to possess one gentle and honest friend, and that one a wife! Beautiful to be able to read her pure soul as in a mirror, and to be aware, therefore of every blot of one's own soul, and to be able to purify it against the day of the great trial.—Mary Howitt

A TEMPERANCE DEACON.—On last New Year's Eve, at Washington, a certain New England deacon, the president of a Temperance Society in these parts, returned to his boarding-house in a singular state of elevation, to the astonishment of all his friends and acquaintances who knew the inflexibility of his principles.

"Deacon," said a wag, addressing the worthy gentleman, "been out visiting?"

"Yes, sur—I have," replied the deacon emphatically.

"Have a good time?"

"Fuss-rate," stammered the deacon.

"They treated you well?"

"Fuss-rate—hiccup!"

"Why, deacon, you haven't been drinking."

"No, Sir!" very emphatically—"I never drink nothing," (the last word in a scream.) "But they did give me—glorious liq—liq—liq—liquid cuss—cuss—cuss—cuss—custards—cuzzards.—And they were fuss-rate—fuss-rater!"

The poor old gentleman had been fed on stiff egg-nog which he had swallowed by the aid of a spoon. Like Mr. Pecksniff, under similar circumstances, he was assisted to bed, and went up stairs quietly enough, without a word, until the moment of entering his bed, when a terrific yell of "liquid cuzzards!" electrified the house, and then, as the novelists say, all was a blank.

AMERICAN BOARD OF MISSIONS.—Donations and legacies received in April, $32,599 19. Total from August 1st to April 30th, $178,648 35. At Constantinople five were added to the Church on the first Sabbath in April, and on every Sabbath new Armenian faces were to be seen in the Protestant congregations. A new church had been organized at Aintab. The Christians of Hasbeyer are protected by the Pasha of Damascus.

A PLEASANT VALEDICTION.—Before the Bishop of New Zealand departed, Sidney Smith, in taking leave, affected to impress upon his friend the dangers of his mission. 'You will find,' he said, 'in preaching to cannibals, that their attention, instead of being occupied by the spirit, will be concentrated on the flesh; for I am told that they never breakfast without a cold missionary on the sideboard. In shaking hands with the new prelate as he was leaving the house, the reverend wit added, 'Good bye. We shall never meet again; but let us hope that you will thoroughly disagree with the savage who eats you.'

"Please to give me a light?" said a little ragged urchin with a long nine in his hand, to a six foot dandy, who was puffing at the end of a regalia cigar, as he was walking the public street.

"What," said the dandy. "a shaver like you smoke?"

"Yes," replied the boy, "every gentleman smokes now-a-days."

The hair lip exquisite dropped his cigar like a hot potatoe,

POST OFFICE ROBBERIES.—Several robberies have occurred, within a few months, of letters containing money, at or between Hartford and Boston. A letter of Messrs. H. & H. Freeman was mailed at Hartford for Boston, last winter, and was robbed of $700. Mr. Austin Dunham of this city had one robbed of a $500 check a few days since. The check was presented at a Boston bank, with a forged indorsement, and paid.—We also understand that during the past week two more letters containing money—one of them a large amount—have been robbed upon the same route.—Hartford Times.

To Delinquent Subscribers.—The following "short and sweet" communication from Detroit, bears date, May 6th, 1848:

Dear Sir:—I send you in this letter all I owe you. I refused the paper when it amount ed to one dollar, and I shall not pay any more.

H. H. Covert.

The first intimation we received that "our worthy patron," Mr. Covert, had refused the paper, was at the end of a year from the expiration of his last term of payment, consequently he was owing $1,50. Publishers are under no obligation to stop a paper till the arrearages are paid. Had Mr. C. sent us $1, at the expiration of eight months and then ordered his paper stopped, he would have shown himself a gentleman. Should two thousand subscribers serve us as he has done, we should be robbed of one thousand dollars, that is, unless we should sue them, in which case the law would be on our side. But it looks like small business to sue a man for fifty cents.

And here let us say to any and to all our subscribers who are in arrears, that we would prefer to have them pay up and stop the paper, rather than to have them receive it longer on credit.

Fashionable Amusements.—We are indebted to some unknown friend for a copy of a discourse on the above subject, by the Rev. G. L. Foster of Jackson, Mich. From it is extracted the following remarks on the theatre:

"If the opinion of such men as Drs. Johnson and Witherspoon, with scores of the virtuous and good now living, is worth anything, or if the voice of common fame is to be regarded as truthful, there is no class of men and women more corrupt, and which are exerting a more corrupting influence than that which conducts the theatres of our large towns, and which pass in troops doing a smaller, dirtier work through the country.—Christianity, morality, and a genuine patriotism all over the land, are condemning these evils.—Heathenism and infidelity condemned them long ago. Plato, Ovid, and Aristotle, speak against all such amusements and those conducting them, as if, though heathen, they professed a strong moral sense of the fitness of things. The infidel Rosseau, when it was proposed to establish a theatre in Geneva, his native place, wrote against it with great zeal and power, declaring that no friend of virtue could approve of it."

Distressing Accident.—Frank Hyde, youngest son of our friend Guy H. Salisbury, was so severely scalded, at Sheldon, Wyoming County whither he had gone with his mother, on Saturday last, that he died on Tuesday, after undergoing intense pain and suffering. He was an interesting child, about four years old, and we deeply sympathise with the bereaved parents in their heavy affliction.—Com. Adv. of May 26.

We knew little Frank well, and he was indeed "an interesting child."

The Columbian Magazine.—The issue of this periodical for the present month, contains an engraved likeness of John Quincy Adams, which is worth more than the price of the number. In the literary department we find the following poem, by Mrs. Jonses (Fanny Forester) of Maulmain, on her "first born:"

My Bird.

Ere last year's moon had left the sky,
A birdling sought my Indian nest,
And folded, oh so lovingly!
Her tiny wings upon my breast.

From morn till evening's purple tinge,
In winsome helplessness she lies,
Two rose leaves, with a silken fringe,
Shut softly on her starry eyes.

There's not in Ind a lovlier bird;
Broad earth owns not a happier nest;
Oh God, thou hast a fountain stirred,
Whose waters never more shall rest!

This beautiful, mysterious thing,
This seeming visitant from heaven,
This bird with the immortal wing,
To me—to me, thy hand has given.

The pulse first caught its tiny stroke,
The blood its crimson hue, from mine;—
This life, which I have dared invoke,
Henceforth is parallel with thine.

A silent awe is in my room;
I tremble with delicious fear;
The future, with its light and gloom,
Time and Eternity are here.

Doubts—hopes, in eager tumult rise;
Hear, oh my God! one earnest prayer:—
Room for my bird in Paradise,
And give her angel plumage there!

The Columbian also contains another lengthy critique on Headley's Washington and his Generals. The writer thus speaks of the moral tone and influence of the work:

"A commander, in his official report, may possibly be excused for calling a conflict glorious, in which ten thousand fellow mortals have fallen—the dreadful price of victory. But the man, who, as a historian, writes the story of the fight, cannot be excused for entering with enthusiasm into what our author would call the "moral grandeur" of the scene. In the name of humanity, in the name of religion we protest against the corrupting tendency of this book. The child, and too often the person of mature years, thoughtlessly follows an author, if the description be interesting, in the principles which he indirectly inculcates. We wish our children not only to understand, but to feel, that all wars, not strictly defensive, are wrong; that the most horrid and revolting scene which earth ever saw, or ever can see, is the battle field; that the aggressive warrior is a murderer in the deepest, darkest meaning of the word; that there is but one kind of "glory" known to thinking, immortal man, and that is moral, the glory caught from our Creator, impressed on our character, transforming us into his image."

Democratic Nominations.—The Democratic National Convention, which met at Baltimore, on the 22d ult., nominated Lewis Cass of Michigan, for President, and Gen. Wm. O. Butler, at present the commander of the American army in Mexico, for Vice President.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW: American edition, republished by Leonard Scott & Co. New York. Three dollars a year, or two dollars when taken in connection with the London, North British and Westminster Reviews.

The April issue of this old and standard quarterly, contains some exceedingly interesting papers. Among them are, Coleridge and Southey, and Modern Quakerism, two which we have read with unabated interest. Of the other papers, the Genius of Plato, and Everett's Measurement of the Meridian in India, will claim the attention of the thinking and the philosophical. The Edinburgh may be had of Burke, who is the authorised agent in this place.

CIRCUSES.—The warm season breeds vermin of a variety of sizes, and of a multitude of names.—Circus players are among them, and perhaps the greatest nuisance. We are sorry to say that they have already begun to pester our city. A swarm was here last week. We are glad to be able to state, however, that their stay was short, and that they probably went away with the "shorts," very little notice having been taken of them. Why any but unthinking boys and loafers can desire to patronize such a set of vagabonds as circus players usually are, seems strange enough.

THE CHRISTIAN REFLECTOR AND CHRISTIAN WATCHMAN, two excellent religious newspapers of Boston; have been united, and now compose one of the largest and best family papers in the country. It is edited by J. W. OLMSTEAD, and WILLIAM HAGUE, two clergymen of the Baptist denomination.

Some matter intended for this week's paper, including Mr. Nichols' lecture, is necessarily postponed till next week.

LATER FROM AFRICA.—The Journal of Commerce has a file of the Luminary published at Monrovia, the capital of the Republic of Liberia, to April 4th.

The U. S. sloop-of-war Jamestown, Capt. Mercer, arrived at Monrovia March 11th. The U. S. brig Boxer arrived 19th; same day, U. S. brig Porpoise, Capt. Gordon, from Port Praya.

The following extract from the Luminary of March 8th, indicates the horrible superstition prevailing among some of the native tribes:

Not long ago, we are creditably informed, a famous Goulah chief, named Selly, being engaged in the war which has been carried on between the Goulahs and Condoes for a number of years, applied to a priest of the Mohammedan profession, to know what he should do to be more successful in his expeditions against the Condoes. The priest enquired of him whether he was able to make the necessary sacrifice, to which he replied that he could make any sacrifice that could be named; upon this the nefarious imposter told him he must sacrifice his son; and, taking his dead body upon his shoulders, his feet swung around his neck and his head hung behind him, in this manner advance before his troops to the contest, and victory would be his!

It is hardly necessary to inform the reader that these sanguinary directions were complied with. Calling his son into a house, he caught him, deliberately tied him, and then, with his own parental hand, he cut his throat! Having offered this sacrifice, he and his troops prepared to advance toward the jurisdiction of their enemies; then was this inhuman father seen with his dead son on his back, in the manner directed, without any display of parental affection, or any emotion save that aroused in his barbarous breast by the confident expectation of victory.

He was successful in three subsequent engagements and undoubtedly ascribes his victory to the costly sacrifice made to obtain it. This inhuman affair is attributed to one that converses as well about the Old Testament, or some parts of it, as most professors of Christianity!

SUDDEN DEATH.—We are called upon to record the death of another of our oldest and most respectable citizens. WILLIAM HOLLISTER, aged 56 years, died suddenly at his residence, about 8 o'clock last evening, of nervous apoplexy. He attended to business during the day, in usual health, but was attacked soon after tea, and lived only about an hour.—Mr. H. was one of our most enterprising business men, having been engaged in this city for more than 25 years in active business, first as a merchant and subsequently in the commerce of the lakes, and in the fur trade, in which latter he was extensively engaged, with his brothers, at the time of his death.—He was the eldest, but one, of ten brothers, nearly all of whom are well known for their enterprising business habits and capacity, in this state, in Ohio and in other Western States. The family consisted of ten brothers and three sisters, and we believe this is the first death which has occurred among their number—a most remarkable case, and one of but few parallels. Mr. H. was a man of plain, unobtrusive habits, devoting himself exclusively to his own business which has grown to be very extensive; yet his loss will be seriously felt by our business community, of which he was one of the acknowledged heads, and by our older citizens by whom his memory will long be cherished.—Com. Adv. May 24.

COSTUME OF THE FRENCH ASSEMBLY.—The Provisional Government have undertaken to regulate the dress of the members of the National Assembly. It has decreed, that the representation of the people shall wear a black coat, a white waistcoat with lappels, and a tri-colored sash with gold fringe. They shall also wear in the button hole on the left side a red ribbon, on which shall be inscribed the fasces of the republic.

NATIONAL OBSERVATORY, May 23, 1848.

GENTLEMEN: I send you a brief notice of two new Stars, from the "National" of May 3d, received from the accomplished Consul of the United States at Paris. But one of them is probably an asteroid. Farther accounts of this interesting discovery will be expected with much impatience by American astronomers. Respectfully, &c.,

M. F. MAURY.

From Le National.

Two new Stars have been seen in the heavens. One, discovered on the night of the 27th of April, by the Irish Astronomer Graham, probably belongs to the group of small planets, already so numerous, situated between Mars and Jupiter; the other, observed in London by Mr. Hind, does not manifest any peculiar motion, and seems to be one of the fixed Stars.

Important from Mexico.

PETERSBURGH, May 24th.

The daily special express has arrived—bringing New Orleans papers to the 18th.

The schooner May arrived at New Orleans on the 18th, from Vera Cruz. At last a quorum of the members of Congress were said to have assembled at Queretaro, and to be waiting the arrival of the American Commissioners to commence their deliberations on the peace question. The speculations as to the result are of the most opposite and conflicting character.

The following pronunciamento from Queretaro was dated April 27th, 11 o'clock at night:—

"The people have become weary with suffering the oppression and sport of petty tyrants. This at least is the case with the Mexican nation, which by the omnipotent exercise of its will has discarded what is called the General Government of the nation established at Queretaro and prostrated to the earth its treacherous oppressors at 9 o'clock on the night of this day. It did this without any resistance, and proclaimed the only plan which under present circumstances can save the country.—This is war. War without truce or quarter, until an honorable peace is conquered. Such is the programme of this revolution, at the head of which are the distinguished Generals Almonte, Bustamente and Paredes, to whose appeals all who are Mexicans rather than partizans will respond. The tocsin of liberty has sounded at last. Sons of Hadelgo and Iturbide awake! The invincible hand of Providence points out to you the road by which every nation on the globe will occupy its true place. Mexicans, fulfil your destiny!"

American deserters are said to be continually arriving at Queretaro, and during the 25th, 26th and 27th ult., no less than 20 presented themselves to the Mexican Government, and were incorporated in San Patricio's company.

The garrison at Queretaro is now composed of 820 men.

A wager of $10,000 has been made at Vera Cruz, for and against the peace, and several of the deputies are said to be concerned in the bet.

A correspondent says Herrera has been nominated as President, and that a majority of the deputies will vote for him.

The express also announces the arrival of the Yucatanese schooner Aparecida, from Campeachy with advices from that place to the 2d inst., from Sisal to the 11th instant, and from Merida to the 20th ult.

The Merida Lannion of the 25th ult., publishes the treaty of peace concluded on the 10th of April at Seucacal, by Commissioners appointed by Signor Miguel Barbachano, Governor of Yucatan, and Jacinto Pat, Commander-in-chief of the revolted Indians. It also contains the ratification by both parties on the 22d of April at Tecul, but says nothing of the rumored breach of faith by the whites and conseqent renewal of hostilities by the Indians.

LATER FROM YUCATAN.—The brig C. E. Platt, arrived at New York on Sunday from Laguna, bringing late files of Yucatan papers. The Courier & Enquirer says:

An extra from the office of the Merida Union contains the official announcement of the ratification of the treaty between Sen. Barbachano and Jacinto Pat, of which accounts have already been received. It is looked upon as terminating the war between the whites and Indians.

Capt. P. informs us that there was a continual arrival at Laguna of emigrants from the vicinity of Merida, leaving everything behind them to the mercy of the Indians and barely escaping with their lives. Their reports of the treatment of the whites by the Indians, especially the females, is horrid and revolting. Many wealthy families have left everything behind them and thrown themselves upon the hospitality of the Americans at Laguna. Under the watchful care of Gov. Bigelow, Capt. P. assures us they will be aided as far as his means permit.

WILD POTATOES.—The Santa Fe Republican, of November 13, says that the potatoe grows wild in the mountains near that place. The largest are about the size of a hen's egg, and the Indians preserve them for winter. It is proposed that they be used for seed in those districts of country that are subject to the potatoe rot.

GREAT BOILER.—An immense boiler passed through on the canal yesterday afternoon. Its length was nearly that of a canal boat, and its diameter about 15 feet. What a monster of a boat it must be of which this is the heart.—Utica Gazette.

The boiler is undoubtedly intended for Capt. HAZARD'S magnificent boat, the Empire State, that in strength, power and greatness promises to be worthy of her illustrious name.

Harricane at Detroit.

A destructive hurricane, accompanied with thunder, rain and hail, swept over Detroit Tuesday evening. Glass was broken, chimneys carried away, shade trees prostrated, lumber blown into the river, the upper deck of the steamboat Wayne taken off and landed in the river, and two small houses demolished. The city property at the Water Works suffered severely, the repairs of which will cost some $2,000.

In relation to the damage done by this storm, the Detroit Daily Advertiser of Saturday has the following particulars:

We learn that the terrible hurricane which passed over this city on the evening of Tuesday last, reached other portions of the State, doing considerable damage. The beautiful and thriving village of Milford, Oakland Covnty, suffered about $5,000 by a terrible and sudden flood, that swept down the Pettibone creek, carrying away the dam across the stream, taking with it the floom, foundation and wheel-house, besides doing great damage to the machinery of the "Pettibone mills," owned by Mr. Hebbard. So great was the force of the water, that rocks weighing from two to four tons were carried four rods down the stream. Just below, on the same stream, the dam to Phelps' saw mill was carried away, and considerable damage done to the mill; the clothing establishment of Mr. Davis, attached, lost its dye-house, &c., &c. Some half a mile below this, the Pettibone empties into the Huron. Below the junction, the dam belonging to Peters' mill was completely demolished. The water at this place rose from four to six feet above the top of the dam, and set back up the Huron so rapidly that it carried away the bridge over the Huron, 40 rods above the junction, and did considerable damage to the Armstrong mills, some ten rods farther above the bridge.

The waters on their course below, passed over the low lands on the farm of L. Fuller, Esq., killing 50 sheep, some of which were found lodged in the branches of the low trees. The dam at Harrison's saw mill, two miles below the village, was also swept off. What is very singular, is, that no person saw or knew anything of it until the next morning, when they awoke and found the effects staring them in the face. It is supposed to have been done between the hours of 12 and 3 o'clock on Wednesday morning.

When it is known that the Pettibone creek is but a small stream, it will appear evident that a very unusually large body of water must have fallen in a very short space of time. The rain fell on Tuesday evening—probably about the hour that the storm passed over this city.

What is singular, too, the flood was confined to the "Pettibone," running into the village from the North, while the Huron, coming in from the East, was affected but little.

The damages, as near as we could learn, were as follows:

W. B. Hebbard, Pettibone Mills, - -	$2,000
Aaron Phelps, Saw-mill and Distillery,	1,000
Geo. Davis, Clothing works, - - -	300
Town of Milford, Bridges, - - - -	500
Taylor & Mann, Armstrong Mills, -	150
Jacob Peters, Peters' Mills, - - -	300
L. Fuller, 50 sheep, - - - - - -	100
Harrison, Saw-mill Dam, - - - -	400
Total, - - - - - - - - -	$4,750

The above estimate does not include a large amount of fence destroyed, and damage to lands, crops, &c., &c. We understand the storm was very severe in many other places, but in no place does it seem that there was as much rain fell as north of Milford.

From the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

Arrival of the Hibernia.

The Hibernia arrived at New York on Saturday. We have already given a Telegraphic sketch of the intelligence brought by her. We condense from the New York evening papers, such other news as is of interest.

The Hibernia brings Liverpool dates to the 13th instant.

The warlike aspect of affairs on the continent has not undergone any material change during the past week. The hostilities in Lombardy have received a new impulse by the accession of the Pope to the Italian confederacy against Austria, whilst Prussia and the allies in the north have entered Denmark Proper, Jutland; and the friendly mediation of England in the quarrel has not yet produced any practical results.

The Danes by sea have now begun to act by a vigorous blockade of all the northern ports. An official declaration of the blockade of Venice by the Austrians has been issued.

From Lombardy there is an hourly expectation of receiving news of a decisive engagement between Charles Albert and the Austrians under the walls of Verona.

The Danes remained shut up in the island of Alsen up to the 4th inst., when it is positively stated that they withdrew to Zealand. The Prussian and allied army is at Weile, holding Frederica, the key of the little belt in their possession. In the mean time the Danes have declared officially the blockade of Stettin, Stralsund Rostock, and Wismar, Pillau and Dantzic, and the Elbe.

It is beyond doubt that the Austrians are in a most critical position, from which they can only be extricated by the opportune advance of Count Nugent, whose successes have, it is said, been checked by the coming up of the allies from the south, and the determined resolution of the people of the country through which he passes to resist his progress.

But the most important event of the war has occurred at Rome. The repugnance of the Pope to declare war against Austria, the most Catholic country of central Europe, has drawn down upon his Holiness the whole weight of popular fury.

On the 1st and 2d inst., a movement was got up at Rome to compel him to declare war against the Austrians, which he long resisted. The safety of the Pope, the cardinals, and, indeed, the city itself being threatened—for the mob vowed they would set fire to it—the Pope at length yielded.

The Ministry was dismissed, a new popular administration formed, and the Terrorists became completely triumphant. The concessions made are, that no priests shall in future fill any public employment, war shall be formally declared, Pope Pius IX. to be the Head of the Government, a daily bulletin of the news from the seat of war to be published, and encouragement given to volunteers amongst the Roman youth to proceed to fight against the Austrians.

The Romans were brought to this pitch of indignation by the cruelties alleged to be practised by Radetsky towards his prisoners. It is even asserted that the Austrians had a scheme of mining Ancona, and blowing up the Neapolitan army on the day it arrived, together with 40,000 inhabitants! These inventions naturally excite the Italians, and portend more difficulties.

The whole of Germany continues in an agitated state, and the report of the collection of an army of 50,000 men between Bamberg and Nuremberg has created a deep sensation at Paris. On the Prussian-Polish frontiers, the utter disorganisation of all government, has led to the most frightful excesses.

As far as we can judge, from the conflicting accounts which reach us, it appears that the Germans having broken faith with the Poles, in certain concessions granted to them, the latter flew to arms.

A succession of the fiercest battles has been fought, the two last at Xionz and Miloslaw have been frightfully bloody The carnage of the first battle was only exceeded by that of the second.

The Prussians had 10,000 men, whilst the Poles were a mere handful, and yet the slaughter was terrific The Prussians were beaten. The whole province of Posen was in arms, and that city is not unlikely to be taken by the Poles.

Between the latter and the Germans the fiercest animosity subsists; the Poles have refused to send any delegates to the Diet, and in fact, abjure all connection with the Germans. Prussia seems to be in a deplorable state, from Treves to Posen; and the distress at Berlin is intense.

The youth of Germany, however, flushed with success at their exploits in Holstein-Schleswig, seem to have constracted the war mania, and are looking out for fresh fields of glory!

The Queen of Portugal has issued a decree, appointing a commission to carry into effect the abolition of slavery in the Portuguese ultra-marine possessions.

FRANCE.—The following government, ad interim, has been appointed by a Committee of the National Assembly:

Foreign Affairs—BASTIDE. War—CHANZY. Finance—DRUCLERE. Justice—CREMIEUX. Instruction—CARNOT. Commerce—FLOCON. Religion—BETHMONT. Public Works—TRELAT. Marine—CASEY. Interior—RECURT. Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs—FAVRE.

IRELAND.

Ireland has become more tranquil. The Limerick affair has tended not a little to this salutary result. It is quite clear that there will be no revolution in Ireland this time; and that whatever changes may be brought about will only be effected by peaceful agitation.

FRANCE.

By the last arrival, we had reports of the election of M. Buchez, President of the Assembly.—He was elected as a "conservative" republican, in opposition to the extreme republicans; but his authority has been limited to one month's duration, and a truly republican jealousy is evinced by the new Assembly which prompts them to guard against any of the encroachments which might be made upon democratic rights; accordingly the delegated power they confer is provisional, and limited until a definitive constitution shall be agreed upon.

But the formation of the executive authority, to carry on the business of the State, is a still more difficult question. At the first attempt to decide this essential point, by nominating a delegated authority of five Ministers, Barbes, the ultra-colonel of the National Guards, ascended the tribune and raised such a confusion, by referring to the late events at Rouen, as plainly to prove that any attempt by the moderate Republicans to exclude the members of the ultra party from a due share in the government, would be followed by a movement of the people to restore the preponderance of the extreme party.

Already the threat is held out; that if the Assembly will not rule the country according to the views of Ledru-Rollin, Louis Blanc, Flocon and Albert, an appeal will be made to the mob to take them. At the sitting of Tuesday this vital question was for the present disposed of, after a rejection by a majority of 411 against 385, of the recommendation of the Bureau that nine Ministers should be directly appointed by the Assembly.

M Lamartine evidently wishes to retain Ledru Rollin in power, however obnoxious his principles may be; as, in the event of his being ejected, the extreme Republicans would appeal to the sword, and raise such confusion throughout France, as would wholly obstruct the action of the Government.

The celebrated Abbe Cacordaire wisely said, that it would be unfair to exclude those Republicans, who in fact had brought about the revolution in February. Accordingly, an intermediate executive authority is appointed consisting of MM. Lamartine, Ledru-Rollin, Arago, Marie, and Garnier Pages.

This body will nominate the administrative Government. At present it seems very doubtful whether a presidential chief will be appointed.—A powerful minority, being only less by twenty-six of the half of nearly eight hundred members, are of opinion that the Executive Government can be carried on by the Assembly itself.

Each man of the three hundred and eighty-five thinks himself as good and as capable as Lamartine; and accordingly, the members who take this view of their duties are not disposed to delegate the authority which the people have granted them.

Marrast has refused to be a member of any body which includes Ledru-Rollin; in fact, the latter would be certainly driven from power by the majority of the Assembly if they voted directly for Ministers; but the wiser and more moderate of the leaders, including Lamartine, conceive that order may be better preserved by allowing Ledru Rollin to remain.

An official order is out putting the whole line of coast in the vicinity of Boulogne in a state of defence, and to fortify the town.

It was reported in Paris that Ledru Rollin had tendered his resignation.

It is reported that Lamartine is endeavoring to bring about an European Congress, to be held for the purpose of regulating the affairs of Poland, Germany, and Italy, and thus put an end to the effusion of blood.

NEW YORK, May 30—3 P. M.

An arrival at New Orleans brings accounts from Queretaro to the 11th, and from the city of Mexico to the 14th inst.

The Mexican Congress was discussing the Treaty in secret session on the 13th, and it was generally believed that it would be ratified. In the Deputies it was thought that the vote would be 61 for peace and 14 for war.

President PENA Y PENA has sent in an able message, in which he defends the Treaty with spirit, and says, peace is the only salvation of Mexico.

It is said that HERRERA has been elected President of Mexico, but was reluctant about taking the office in the present state of affairs.

The trials of Lieuts. Hare, Dutton, Madison and Tilden, Surgeants Wragg and Stewart, and private Will, for burglary and murder in the city of Mexico, have resulted in their conviction, and they have been all sentenced to be hung. The commanding General had not yet approved the sentence.

Gen. KEARNEY has left Vera Cruz for the city of Mexico. Col. WILSON is again governor of Vera Cruz.

There had been an attempt to get up a pronunciamento against the Government, but it was soon smothered.

A Franciscian friar and several other Mexicans have been arrested in the city of Mexico, on charges of inducing American soldiers to desert.

The British brig Brothers has been totally wrecked in Tampico Bay. Loss $150,000.

A Telegraph despatch from Washington says: Despatches have been received from the city of Mexico which speak with entire confidence of the ratification of the Treaty. Mr. SEVIER had gone to Queretaro, determined to push the negotiations to a close. Mr. CLIFFORD was still at the Capital. Both were extremely sanguine of a speedy and favorable termination of their mission.

EXHUMATION.—We witnessed this forenoon the disinterment of the remains of John Glover, a son of Pelatiah Glover, second minister of Springfield. He was buried in January, 1664, one hundred and eighty-four years ago. Notwithstanding the lapse of this long period, pieces of the decayed coffin, and all the larger bones of the body, with the skull and portions of the hair yet remaining upon it, were found, and removed. This is the oldest grave, save one, the identity of which is known.—Springfield Gaz.

Burial of the Beautiful.

Where shall the dead and the beautiful sleep?
In the vale where the willow and cypress weep;
Where the wing of the west breathes its softest sigh,
Where the silvery stream is flowing nigh,
And the pure clear drops of the rising sprays
Glitter like gems in the bright moon's rays—
Where the sun's warm smiles may never dispel
Night tears o'er the form we loved so well—
In the vale where the sparkling waters flow;
Where the fairest, earliest violets grow;
Where the sky and the earth were softly fair,
Bury her there—bury her there!

Where shall the dead and the beautiful sleep?
Where wild flowers bloom in the valley deep;
Where the sweet robes of spring may softly rest
In purity over the sleeper's breast;
Where is heard the voice of the sinless dove,
Bemoaning her absent truant love;
Where no column proud in the sun may glow,
To mock the heart that is waiting below;
Where pure hearts are sleeping, forever blest:
Where wandering Peri love to rest;
Where the sky and the earth are softly fair,
Bury her there—bury her there:

GOING THROUGH CHANCERY.—A friend tells a very good story about the ease and convenience of a transit through Chancery. An acquaintance was accustomed to drive the best horse and the costliest buggy in the neighborhood. The crack of his whip was as alarming as the whistle of a steam boiler. But steam fails for want of fuel—and so did the 'whip.'

Chancery, chancery. No remedy but in chancery. Horse stopped—buggy stopped—payment stopped. But soon, oh, how soon—'whip' was seen again by his old friends, driving his own horse and buggy—the identical team that he had driven before.

"How now," said an old acquaintance, "the same old horse and buggy again! I thought you had been through Chancery."

"So I have—but my horse and buggy went round."

Lord Chancellor Thurlow said to a clergyman, who, without any letter of introduction, applied for a vacant rectory, "Whom have you to recommend you?"

"Only the Lord of Hosts, my Lord."

"Well," replied Thurlow, "as it is the first recommendation I have had from His Lordship, be assured I shall attend to it," and conferred the living upon him.

THE TWO HEAPS.—"I see in this world," said Rev. John Newton, "two heaps—one of human happiness and one of misery; now if I can take but the smallest bit from the second heap, and add to the first I carry a point. If, as I go home, a child has dropped a half-penny, and by giving it another, I can wipe away its tears, I feel that I have done something. I should be glad indeed to do great things, but I will not neglect such little ones as these."

We must Part.

Yes, we must part, too long, too far
Already have our footsteps strayed,
Lured by the brightness of a star,
That hath fictitious radiance shed.
It is not hope, it is not faith that lures us on,
It is the light of love's intenseness—hope is gone.

Shall we not part? Since ere we met
The bonds of life were interposed;
And on our souls the seal was set
Of vows which hold till life has closed—
And shall we break that bond and seal that we may meet?
Or shall we tread those sacred vows beneath our feet?

Ah! thus we should put out the light,
And break the sacred guards of life;
And on us soon would come a night
Of dark and soul-consuming strife—
Yes, we might meet, but oh at what a fearful cost!
Then let us part while love is pure, and truth not lost.

The Golden Age.

A Lecture before the Young Men's Association.

BY A. P. NICHOLS, ESQ.

A widowed mother, pale and worn with watching, sits by the bedside of her dying child. A small and rude apartment, scantily furnished with articles of simplest necessity, constitutes her home. Upon the cleanly swept hearth, a few half-consumed billets of wood burning with a fitful blaze, are struggling to diffuse some warmth through the chillness around. A feeble light, whose beams are quickly lost in the darkness they strive to illumine, stands near the sufferer's cot so that the mother may detect, with instant perception, the slightest change flitting over the features of her child. Winds are howling around, assailing every unprotected crevice, and moaning a funeral dirge as if in sympathy with the desolation within.—Death knocks at the door of this lonely home and demands admission——perhaps in mercy. The glazed eye which but a moment since has lost its lustre; the languid and labored breath; the slight quick twitching of convulsed effort, bid him welcome. Poor mother, thou art alone! Death and thy child have passed away together. Those eyes which have so often turned to thee in love, and beamed with a glistening beauty which was but a reflection of the love they saw in thine, shall be here relumed no more. Those lips, fresh as young rose-buds, where smiles made their home, and which were to thee as a well-spring in the desert, shall smile no more! Death has kissed them with his cold, icy breath, and they are blanched to clay! Public charity shall give the delicate form of thy child back to the bosom of its mother earth, and the daisy or forget-me-not, wind-sown, perchance shall be its only head stone. But fear not—there is One who careth for thee!

Upon the opposite side of the street stands the palace of opulence. Its marble front and doubled windows bid defiance to the cold and the tempest. The bronzed lions that guard its porch frown sternly upon us as we approach. Let us appease these grim sentinels by a word of friendship and enter. But there is one before us. Fell disease has eluded the vigilance of the guardian lions, and entering here, has struck down, within this fastness, open alike to his entrance as the widow's frail dwelling, the fairest of a rosy group. Here also the mother sits watching by her dying child.—Reared and attended with nicest care, surrounded by an atmosphere never tainted by want, the child now gasps for that breath common to all. Science has lent her profoundest skill, and wisdom yielded her richest treasures for its rescue, but in vain.—Servants move noiselessly about, and the foot-falls of condoling friends, coming and going, are lost in the silent recesses of luxurious carpets. The pictures wear a mournful expression—flowers still bloom but with less of brightness, and the thousand ornaments which wealth had accumulated now lie neglected and valueless. A dark shadow hovers for an instant over the couch of pain, and thou, too, poor mother, art alone! The light of the dwelling is dimmed. But not by hands of public charity shall the form of what was once parcel of thy best affections, be borne to the grave.—The sable hearse, the palled horses with nodding plumes and many mutes who weep by contract, make up a stately ceremonial. The vaulted tomb receives its sacred deposite, and the sculptured marble tells of the last resting place of the child of affluence.

And thus, these two children, born, living, and dying upon opposite sides of the same street, and who, in life, were, and had they lived, would have been, sundered wide as the poles, may now, hand in hand, be playing amid the bowers of the blest, and chaunting with the Cherubim. Such marked extremes does this life present. From what causes do they spring? Are they the result of an inexorable law of being, or shall we find their roots shooting up from a soil of artificial creation? And between these two extremes, how many others are comprehended of less and lesser extent, springing from the same or modified causes?—From these two pictures, imaginary in form, but real in fact, flow as from two fountains, the small and scattered rills of thought and suggestion which make up my volume for to-night.

It has been remarked by an accomplished observer, that there is nothing which so strongly seizes upon the imagination of mankind as the possession of property and the consciousness of exercising over it sole and unlimited dominion. A glance over the world and society will at once prove the truth of the observation. We see its germ in the dawning of the earliest instincts, its continued and fuller development in their growth and maturity. The child, long before it is aware of the value of its bauble or toy, feels the pleasure growing out of possession, and cries if the instinct is not gratified. Men are but children of a larger growth, and their cries often bear a most startling resemblance to those they uttered in infancy, if the charm of possession be broken, or their baubles and toys be taken from them. Wealth in its myriad forms and influences, rests upon us like a mantle. It is around us and about us like the casing air, and like the air, it is sometimes pure and sometimes impure. It is a thing exceedingly difficult entirely to expel all air from a vessel, so that you may have what is called an exhausted receiver, in which experiment may be made with bodies of matter, undisturbed by external influences. But who ever heard of an exhausted receiver in the realms of gold, in which the human heart, purged from all grosser influences, neither deadened by the chillings of selfishness nor contracted by the cold touch of avarice, would respond sweetly to the fresh pure instincts and ennobling emotions which are native to the worst of us, the delicacy and truthfulness of its action undisturbed and unswerving? On the contrary, we are continually striving to fill, not exhaust, this receiver, in which the heart acts, and to clog its freedom with countless impediments. Like the robe of snow which covers and warms the earth but chills and benumbs those who walk through its drifts, unless they are protected against its effects, so this golden mantle which wraps us in its folds, will benumb and paralyze the heart unless it be clad in the warm garments of generous sentiment and holy charity. To glance at some of the disturbing agencies which wealth, its acquisition and unequal distribution produce in the social system,—to speak of the benefits and inestimable privileges which it confers—to give tongue to a few of the dumb and nameless miseries and oppressions which it inflicts—to brand avarice as treason alike to man and God, in a word, to vindicate justice and assert for mind and man that position of superiority which is as much above mere wealth, as heaven is above earth, though the latter were a solid globe of gold—these are the points on which I purpose to myself to speak, with your kind permission, feebly as I know I must, yet honestly and fittingly as but I may.

> "In nature's chain whatever link you strike, > Tenth, or ten-thousandth, breaks the chain alike,"

So here, it is quite immaterial where we begin. Society, like a many stringed instrument, is so indissolubly united, part with part, by a system of interlacing network, made up of hopes and fears, interests and sympathies, that like electric chords, all vibrate at the touch of one. The reason why the disposition to acqcire, takes such strong and abiding hold upon mankind, and the career of successful accumulation becomes so fascinating, is to be found, doubtless, mainly in the fact, that it confers upon the seeker consciousness of power, a possion so darling to all. Consciousness of power is but another expression for gratified vanity or flattered self love, and where beats the human heart that is a stranger to these emotions? But there are other and better motives which animate us in the race of acquisition. Prominent among these may be mentioned the love of personal independence, freedom from unwilling and galling obligations, and the inherent desire to surround ourselves with the comforts of life—a spirit of prudent forecast, which in the vigor of manhood, would reap a harvest for the sustenance of age, when failing powers and decaying energies can no longer grasp the sickle,—a wish to provide means for the gratification of refined tastes, the cultivation of letters and the amenities of social intercourse. These are most laudable and of highest moment. The difficulty lies in discrimination, in ascertaining the line of separation between the prudent man and the gold-worshipper or miser.—Wealth being the result of labor, and labor, in some department, constituting one of the primal conditions of being, call it rather a blessing than a curse, it must therefore inevitably accumulate.—It would be manifestly unphilosophical, to neglect in this connection, the consideration of another fact which exerts a powerful, not to say controlling, influence, and this is, that by reason of the universality of the strife, the accumulation and possession of certain indefinite sums become a standard of judgement—a touch-stone to which we apply the results of life, and thus arrive at a conclusion: for we all know

> That peop'e who stand upon golden legs,
> Are sure to stand well with society.

In a word, we may almost see every man living out a sum in division—his wealth is the quotient and he strives to make it as large as he can.

Impelled by such powerful and varied stimuli to action, incited by a spirit of emulation which would outstrip all competition in the race, need we wonder that so many should banish sleep from their pillows and peace from their bosoms—task mind and muscle to the last limit of endurance, in order to gather up these glittering heaps and cast them at the feet of a prevalent opinion—a votive offering, that they may receive the welcome salutation from the brotherhood, "well done, thou good and faithful servant." From the match boy in the streets, who trades upon his farthing capital, to the merchant whose argosies, freighted with the "wealth of Ormus and of Ind," float upon every sea—from the gambler with the dice box, to the gambler in produce and stocks—from him who has nothing, to him whose coffers and vaults are filled to bursting, come up the steady ceaseless hum, the notes of traffic and the song of gold. I speak of a people at large. All general propositions must, necessarily, be taken with many exceptions. There are large numbers who have other thoughts, and are engaged in other avocations, who are not and will not thus, be entirely engrossed. There are more who, as their eye runs along the future, see cool and shady retreats, inviting them to repose, and hear the ripple of flowing waters in the distance, by whose margin the spirit shall refresh itself and throw off forever the load of care which has already become too heavy.—But as they journey on, these intervals seem more and more distant, until at length, they see no places hallowed to rest, and, like slaves at the oar, they continue to toil, till the end of their course. It has been charged upon us, as a nation, that we are more devoted to gold than any other—that with us, the dollar is almighty. As implying that the spirit of activity and business enterprise is every where rife among us, it may be admitted, but, as charging upon us an intenser greed of wealth, which springs out of a peculiar trait of national character, other things being equal, it is submitted, with all confidence, that the assertion is wholly gratituous. It should be bore in mind, that with us, where the law neither makes nor recognizes any fictitious ranks or classifications, and where the career of action and the channels of business are left open alike to all—where all starting from a common level, work their way upward, according to the bent of disposition, and innate force of character which is inherent in each, a very different state of things must exist, than is to be found in those countries, where overgrown estates descend from father to son under the law of entails, and the doctrine of primogeniture. There, each successive generation is but the possessor of an estate, without the power of disposing of it, which must fall, in turn, to its fixed successor. Here, however large an estate may be, it is subject to all the uncertainties of hazardous speculation and the hurricanes of commercial crises. There the heritor of wealth which he cannot altogether dissipate, and of legal and social position, which satisfy a reasonable ambition, feels not the same disposition to engage in the active pursuits of life which would otherwise press upon him. Here, the artificer of his own fortune, the boy is hardly out of leading strings, before he begins to cast about him, with a kind of Yankee shrewdness, to see how things look, and think of setting out to seek his fortune. Hence the difference: reverse positions and you reverse results. Many other reasons why we see a more general individual activity, (and which is misinterpreted as a greater love of gold) among our people than is found in others, might be mentioned, but I content myself with having noticed the principal one, which is, that the law, in the one case, secures those advantages which, in the other, are the result of individual effort. I could not, however, check the impulse to contribute my quota towards the refutation of what I regard as an aspersion of our national character. Seeing then, that all men are, and, from the nature of the case, while they remain the same, must be engaged in the accumulation of wealth, we naturally pass to a consideration of some of the results which flow from its possession. And here we wish to assert, in the broadest manner, that every man's right, so far as his fellows are concerned, to the fruits of his own thrift and industry, is indisputable and sovereign, and that all projects to take them from him, without his permission, under whatever name they are known, whether by forced periodical divisions or compulsory gifts, are utterly at war with the simplest principles of justice, and with that sense of personal independence, which lies at the base of manly character. The springs of charity and generosity must bubble up in the heart from their own internal promptings and not from the force of outward pressure.

To be a true man, one must be a freeman. A slave never was and never will be anything but a moral dwarf, and you may just as well control the labor of the hand, as the product of that labor.—This idea of unlimited right over property, which has just been mentioned, is not intended to exclude that of governments to collect and expend certain contributions for the common weal.—Wealth regarded as an end, is utterly valueless, nay, it is not negatively bad, but is affirmatively pernicious, but as means to an end, it is the Archimedean lever which lifts a world. As an end, its acquisition is worse than puerile, not worthy even of brute instinct, (and brutes, it may be said in passing, are never caught in so silly an occupation,) but as means, it may challenge the exercise of the lofty intellect of man, "in apprehension show like a God:" for in its broadest acceptation, it may be said to be but the perfect development of the laws of mind and matter, and their mutual relations, and whatever tends to this achievement may well challenge our noblest powers. Of itself, man can neither eat it, drink it nor protect himself from the vicissitudes of heat and cold, but through its assistance, he may accomplish them all. Nay, what may he not do with it? He levels mountains, tunnels cities, and rivers roll in beds, obedient to his will. Forests fall before him—deserts blossom as the rose and the earth throws up her ores and jewels to the sun. He spreads the sail of commerce and frets, with million keels, the waters of every zone, making the choice products of every clime and country distant and remote, his own.

The Leviathan roameth through the caverns of his ocean home a king, but the hardy whaler doth "put a hook into his nose," or "fill his skin with barbed irons," when lo! beneath his light, in the drawing rooms of earth, flushes the cheek of beauty with a brighter glow, and her hair is lustrous with diamonds fresh from Golconda's mines, and pearls caught up from the depth of Indian seas.—Myrrh and cassia from the tropics, furs from the poles, come at the clink of the golden hammer, and cast themselves at his feet. Even the stars of heaven, seen through the lenses of science, (and science is but the product of wealth in another form) seem to sweep down from their lofty pavillions and submit themselves to his inquisitive gaze. Lightning has consented to put itself in harness, and this compound of fire and destruction is now his dray-horse, doing his imperious bidding with docility. It has now something else to do besides tracing its flaming characters, awful but unmeaning, on the ragged banner of the storm, or building airy castles, pinnacled with rosy light, in the northern sky. The rise and fall of stocks, run along the living wires, while the whispered breathings of love may catch an intenser glow from the rapidity of their transit. We may say of it, as Halleck has said of the old Highlander, in reference to civilization, it has at last

> "Consented to be taxed and vote—
> To put on pantaloons and coat—
> And leave off cattle stealing"

Wealth has entered the laboratory of the chemist and enabled mind to distil those draughts, more potent of forgetfulness, than all the waters of Lethe's fabled stream. It scatters books, letters and thoughts over the earth, broad cast, as flower-seeds are borne by the tireless winds. It builds school-houses and colleges, where mind wrestles with mind in earnest encounter, until logicians, sages, philosophers and statesmen, "armed in panoply complete," walk forth into life's arena, ready to wrestle for the government and guidance of the world. And lastly, but not least, in this connection, it erects churches, and sends the self-sacrificing missionary to the ends of the earth, and his pathway, though environed by dangers and hedged about with privations, is yet luminous with the light of the gospel he dispenses. Wherever civilization has flown, pioneered by ennobling trade and adventurous commerce, wealth has been its constant attendant, and beneath its potent influence, have sprung up and been nurtured those myriad habits, tastes, refinements, comforts and elegancies which mark the difference between the civilized man and the barbarian.

Are we not greatly indebted then, to this agent which has done so much for us, and is not the ascertainment of its true position and character, worthy of a little examination? Like all other agents, its powers have sometimes been perverted, and disastrous results have ensued. In this rapid sketch of some of the fruits, in a national point of view, it has borne to man, in the varied race they have run together, I may mention fierce and sanguinary wars. Even our own glorious revolution, which we so love to recall and contemplate with reverential regard, was one of these. Indeed it was a war of the highest principle, but of principle applied to the most sensitive of all parts—the purse. Taxation without representation was the crowning trouble. The British parliament might have gone on till doomsday, in promulgating, in the most formal manner, the grossest absurdities, and our stern old fathers would have grimly smiled, but they never would have thought of refuting them by the sword and the matchlock. But when power usurped, in the semblance of law, embodied in the form of the tax-gatherer, sought to insinuate its hand into their pockets, then they vowed, and most righteously, to resist to the death.

Let no one suppose that I would underrate the dignity—the majesty of that spirit of resistance or belittle it, by speaking of dollars and cents. The highest principle of manhood was attacked—that of personal independence—that which makes us freemen, in the attempt to divest us of the fruits of our labor, without permission. I speak of it to show how intimately wealth is associated with the highest relations. So our later war with the same power: from what causes did it spring, but the impudent assumption and attempted enforcement of claims which were infringements upon the dearest rights of the citizen. Free trade and sailor's rights was the pivot on which it hinged. So in the present war with Mexico, whatever politicians may say to the contrary; it has grown out of the complicated relations and violated engagements of commerce. Indeed, it would be difficult to find a single instance where war has not sprung from these causes, always excepting those which have been waged for the humane purpose of propagating religious opinions, and they have sometimes taken that form but to mask ulterior designs.

Wealth, then, being but accumulated labor, whether our own or others, the great question would seem to be, not so much, how we should acquire, as how much we should acquire, how use and apply it. To use wisely and justly is more difficult that to acquire. We turn to these considerations, glancing, as we pass, at some of the prominent influences it exerts upon society. I will assume here what it is believed no one will attempt to deny, and that is, that money is to be regarded as the means and not the end, for, however the daily actions of multitudes may belie the admission, the proposition when plainly and plumply presented to the mind, seems a thing far different from that which they are working out in their daily life. One thing is certain: it cannot go hence with us. To whatsoever uses we would apply it, that must be done here. Unlike our acts of goodness, it will not accompany the soul through its limitless hereafter, pleading ever, with an eloquent earnestness which may hardly be resisted, for a gentler judgement upon our many frailties. There are certain contingencies against which all persons of prudence should carefully provide. These have already been indicated. To hoard, merely to give to those who may come after us immense riches, would seem to be unwise—to amass, merely for the sake of amassing, still more so. The history of large estates, not only in this country, but in all others where they are left unfettered by legal restrictions and subject to the vicisitudes of trade, will show the fallacy of the principle. They tend to division and diffusion. Two or three generations usually suffice to work the transformation, nay a single one, often sees the hoarded treasures of long years scattered, and the heir to affluence, in poverty. The attempt however, to set limits to the extent of accumulation in theory or otherwise, were futile. Men have a strong inclination to do exactly as they please, without let or hindrance. It is entirely proper however, to enquire, whether we do not strive to accumulate too much, in fine, whether man has nothing else to do but make money. Has he not powers other than those which enable him to add, subtract, multiply and divide? Has he not capacities for pleasure and instincts for enjoyment? Has he not a mind and soul which roam, at will, over the earth and even to the gates of Heaven, and drink in joy from a thousand springs. He is not a cart-horse, simply. He has a touch of immortal fire in his composition, and while he may not spurn the earth, in the neglect of duties enjoined, yet he ought never to forget, that he has wings, and should, sometimes, mount and soar. As a people, we are doubtless too much addicted to mere money getting—too strongly wedded to gold.

We have too few proper rational amusements —too little relaxation. The business faculties and energies are kept in a state of continued, extreme tension, and the elasticity of the spirit is thereby enfeebled. A scanty half-hour, snatched from a meal, or a few hours stolen from the task-masters labor, and given grudgingly to sleep, are not enough. Man should have (or rather take, for he has it) time for reading, thinking, conversation, travel, pleasure, and all the enjoyments of social intercourse, for he is eminently social in his nature.—He should be permitted to develop to the full, all his powers and capacities, not forced to dwarf or pervert them. The former he cannot do, if he have no opportunity to exercise them, while the latter will be the inevitable result of giving to one, unchecked dominion over the others. All should be kept along equally together. Whatever is added, improperly, to one, is stolen from another.—God made us and has given us all the faculties we possess. What came from his hand must needs be good. The evil is our own and proceeds from the perversion of what was intended for good.—In the language of Paley, "we never discover a train of circumstances to bring about an evil purpose. No anatomist ever discovered a system of organization calculated to produce pain or disease, or in explaining the parts of the human body, ever said, this is to irritate, this to inflame—this gland to secrete the humour which forms the gout. So in relation to the faculties of the mind. Who has ever discerned faculties there, designed to demoralize and debase us. Who, in explaining them, ever said, "this is to make you profane—this to make you intemperate, this to make you cruel and this to make you dishonest."—And is not this true?

Let no one think that I would promulge a gospel of indolence or point to a paradise of slothful inactivity. A walking do-nothing I hold in the lowest estimation, as one unjust to himself and to all around him. I have before said that it was every one's lot and duty to labor—that labor was a blessing not a curse, but I would have man labor with intelligence, not like the ox which blindly treadeth out the corn, without design or purpose. I would have him live by the laws which govern him, struggle howsoever he may, and whose violations are always punished, and not by accident. I would have him labor with heart and head, as well as hands, and garner up those fruits of immortality which his hand alone is permitted to pluck. He should know that there are other rewards of toil than gold—that the fountain heads of knowledge are never dry, but are perpetually welling up to cool the parched lip of the seeker—that the treasures of mind—the virgin ore of thought—the flashes of fancy, the glowing brilliancy of wit, the dazzling splendors of imagination and the majestic loveliness of hope, through whose brightness he sees Heaven—that these are the fruits which grow in the field where he is permitted, not to glean, but to reap, in the full tide-time of harvest, and shall he, yielding to the base promptings of his lower nature, turn aside from all these, and starve upon the husks of wealth—mere gold? Shall he leave all these, and abandon himself, body and soul, to the trade and mystery of making yankee clocks and wooden nutmegs? Shall he bury his heart alive, (better far the burying of the Indian widow in the grave of her husband,) in his counting room or salamander safe? Shall he lose himself in the intricacies of double-entry, and in learning how to avoid, with nicest precision, the sharp points of some jaggad law against usury? Strange infatuation! and yet you need not look the distance across this room, before your eye shall alight upon such an one.

Once more, I beg not to be thought as advocating idleness, or that men should not be thrifty and accumulate, and make reasonable provision for the future, educate well their children, and earn means to cotribute their quota towards carrying on the great system of the world's development, mental, moral and physical, but only that the excess of these efforts shall not be permitted to engross all his attention—belittle his thoughts and degrade his nature: as merely insisting that he has other wants equally commanding his attention.—

Is there any necessity that man should labor for mere accumulation's sake, in one incessant round, from the morning of life to the night of death?—Certainly not, so far as his actual wants are concerned. With us health need never know poverty in its sternest aspect. Our extensive country, with the virgin soil, welcomes all who come within her generous embrace. From her munificent bosom, her green savannas and sunny slopes—her flowery meads and mountain sides, flow streams unceasing, of abundance and plenty.

In the earlier periods of the history of the race, matters were far different. True, man's wants were simpler and fewer, but then how much smaller the means of gratification. He had to labor with his hands alone, or such rude implements as necessity or ingenuity fashioned, and the labor of a life would not have produced much surplus, over and above his wants. Ages rolled by—inventions and improvements kept on their steady course, through doubtless repeated efforts but ended in repeated failures, hindering their progress then as now, until at length the clumsy stool grew into the nicely adjusted rocking-chair and the luxurious sofa—the tent of reeds and boughs to the princely mansion—the covering of skins to all the varied and marvellous products of the loom, and the hour-glass or waterclock into the almost living chronometer. How strange, how passing strange the transformation! See yon peerless creature as she moves amid an admiring crowd, her cheeks glowing with conscious lovliness, her course luminous with the light of beauty. From her jewelled brow to her tiny slipper, observe what cunning workmanship has adorned her person. Every zone has been laid under contribution. And that gentleman who walks by her side—mark his princely apparal! Who could trace the slightest resemblance between this pair and their progenitors (to go no farther back) who rode out the flood in the ark, surrounded by every variety of company. And what has wrought this wondrous change?—simply mind acting upon matter.

Does any one doubt that then steam possessed the same compressive and expansive qualities which now produce such stupendous results?—Does any one doubt that the mechanical powers then existed which now, adjusted by mind, in almost infinite combinations, sit the presiding spirits over all the varieties of complicated machinery? All were there, and they but needed the hand of genius to bring them forth. The slumbering energies of steam were all there—they needed only to be made available, not to be created. The wedge, the pully, the screw, lever, wheel and axle were all there. It was only necessary that they should be geared up and set in motion. Matter was created perfect. It contained within itself no element of progression, but every particle was formed in obedience to, and with reference to being governed by, certain fixed, unvarying laws. Man found himself in possession of this inert unshapely mass, but, endowed with powers capable of developing, one by one, the laws of this wonderful creation, unveiling the mysteries of its hidden mechanism, ascertaining its properties and capabilities new to him, and applying them, one and all, to the use and enjoyment of himself and his fellows. He has explored air, earth and ocean, and in all of them, in every age, has discovered properties, unknown to the wisest in the one which preceded it. Is there not proof in this, that mind is superior to matter, and that inasmuch as it is superior it is entitled to higher regard?

And what results do we see, what argument is disclosed, as the fruit of this impress of mind upon matter, this progress of scientific enquiry which invents, constructs and adapts machinery to the countless purposes of life—which looks upon what was apparently of no value before, and makes it something, by showing how it may be rendered an auxiliary of progress—which in some seeming lump of dead earth, detects a living law as beautiful as that which wheels the burning stars? For my part, I think I see in it an argument full of the highest hope and most inspiring confidence. I think I see in it, the dawning of a higher, brighter life for humanity. I think I see it written in letters of light, that man was not formed, always to be a beast of burthen—a hewer of wood and a drawer of water—that the pressure of his physical wants is not always to be the measure of his action—that muscle and brawn are not the only part of his nature which will yield a return for cultivation.

One has hardly the capacity to realize how infinitely greater an amount of result, can be accomplished by one man, now, aided by the manifold inventions of mechanical genius, than in the earlier ages of the world. And what is the effect of all this—what must it be but the lifting off from the yet bended neck, this immmense, this almost incalculable weight? Will not this relief cause man to stand more erect and keep his head further from the ground, making him look less like a four-footed creeper? Who shall doubt it? And is not here something gained? Add to this, that more correct notions as to the relations of the governor and governed prevail, and that the labor of millions is not now required, or rather would not be given, to build monuments to flatter the pride or pamper the vanity of despotic rulers. Will the world ever see a second edition of the pyramids? Will another Chinese wall ever stretch its colossal proportions over a space of 2000 miles? As wiser ideas are diffused, will the Indian carver in ivory, continue to spend a whole life in the manufacture of some cunning toy, to decorate a dressing table? Now these aids derived from the development and successful application of the laws of nature, and the juster direction given to labor, have furnished mankind, as it were, with one great holiday—or rather with many, scattered through a life.

Genius to invent and the economical thrift of previous industry, which furnished the means necessary to make all those million experiments which have ended in the discovery and application of those laws which enable man, as it were, to work the world, have brought us to our present position. Yet it is melancholly to see how blindly man has allowed himself to be wedded to ignorance, and how closely he has hugged his chains. We could hardly deem it possible, did not proofs incontrovertible exist, that many have doubted whether the triumphs of mind in making machinery for man, instead of making man into a machine, were to exercise a final beneficial result. There have been instances where ignorant men, who have lost employment, and that of a deadly character, for a limited period, by the introduction of some new variety mechanism, not perceiving that what they regarded as loss in one place, was returned more than seven-fold into their bosoms, in another, have headed riots and mobs for the destruction of their enemy. We speak of that blind spirit of fanaticism which makes the Hindoo devotee throw himself beneath the wheels of Juggernaut, or cast himself upon spears or lances, as terrible—as passing all belief. But are there not Juggernauts, other than those found in India? Have not men, or beings wearing the forms of men, in their accursed lust of gold, turned dull, blind, objectless labor, into a mighty overshadowing monster which has crushed the life and soul out of millions?—Have they not placed brutish ignorance and strong muscle in one scale and bread and life in the other? Some one shall answer for all this—some where shall restitution be made. The bolts of indigment justice may slumber for a time, but they lose not their power of vengeance. Inasmuch as man has been relieved from the primeval weight of labor which rested upon him, he has now time to devote to other aims. Every hour, truly and fairly won from the labor of the hand, may, and should be, most righteously, devoted to the cultivation of the mind and heart—the nursing of joys and affections, the growing and reaping of innocent pleasures and delights. For the hour which before, man was compelled to smite the anvil and from which he is now reprieved, let him go forth and worship nature—let him

> Watch the pearly advent of morn,
> And relish the odor fresh from the thorn.

The purest pleasures are always cheapest.—What of beauty can money buy to compare with this? For the hour before, that he pored over some counterfeit detecter or begrimed his hand with perpetual dabbling in gold, let him look upon nature's fair, unsullied sheet—he will find no tale of fraud and deception there—and purify his vision, if he must needs look upon something yellow, by admiring the grained gold which Heaven deposites in the lily's snowy bosom. Instead of locking his heart up in his money chest, or wracking it with devices how to gain cent per cent, let it go forth and love some other human heart, which will return more than it receives, nor grudge the exhorbitant usury. Aye, let him read, think, converse—be a man. But if so much has already been done, if man has already been relieved of such onerous burthens, is that a reason for stopping and saying that the extremest limit has been attained? Who shall dare say that everything has been discovered—that the secrets of nature have all been explained—all her treasures exhausted? We may rest assured that until all this is done, man has something yet to do.

Does any one suppose that that condition of things which man traces out from particulars to generality, and calls a law, was created without purpose or design? Has anything been created without a specific adaptation? If created for a purpose—then for what purpose—for whose benefit? We may say that it cannot be to benefit matter, for we have never detected there any qualities which could be benefitted. If not for matter, then, is it saying too much, that it must have been intended for man. first for his discipline, in compelling him to find out this law of design, and finally for his good, through a full moral development which it would give the means of ensuring, enabling him, not to free himself, but to show that he would strive to be freed from the penalty which caused his transgression. Is there any fear that man may be too happy on this earth? If not, then let us bid God speed to all these aids, which, directly and indirectly, nearly and remotely tend to his advantage.

One of the most prominent social evils which grow out of our intense business activity and consequent spirit of accumulation is, that, being the engrossing topic of life—the one which is most entirely in our thoughts, this feeling by a natural transition, takes the highest place in the judgment seat when we pass in review the actions and condition of others. The chief good so often in ourselves why should it not appear the chief good in others? Taught from our infancy. first, by the general habit of those about us, then by direct gentle admonitions, and at last by imperious necessity, that if we would successfully enter the lists for competition with the world, we must don golden armor, how natural that we should strive to do so. Let men know that they are to be judged by a given standard, and they will leave no effort untried to conform to it, even though their better judgment may tell them the standard is untrue—the balance false. Hence a portion of the strong disposition we see, to accumulate, grows out of a desire to stand well in the eyes of the world, as well as from the conciousness of power which it gives and the other considerations which have been suggested. It may be stated as a general proposition (though to the honor of humanity, there are many brilliant exceptions) that in passing judgment upon any given individual, the opinion of the world is greatly influenced by the amount of worldly possessions. If he be rich, he is pronounced successful; if poor, he is looked upon, with a kind of pitying eye, which seems to say, "poor fellow, you have but sadly performed your task." Do you want proof of this? Look around! See worth cramped by want in a garret, and guilt lapped in luxurious ease. The one is spurned—the other courted.

> "Through tattered clothes small vices do appear,
> Robes and furred gowns hide all.
> Plate sin with gold, and the strong lance of justice > hurtless breaks.
> Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it."

What business has the man whose capital is a white soul and spotless honor, in those marts, where the sharp, keen-browed sons of trade, skilled in the chicane of speculation, armed to the teeth, with stocks and bills, and banker's checks and warehouse receipts, most do congregate? Why, their sense of propriety would be shocked at the sight of the intruder, and had they the power, he would be banished from their presence, a leper white as snow. Yet is he not truly worth as much as they? Does he not then find

> "That noble name and cultered land,
> Palace and park and vassal band,
> Are powerless to the notes of hand
> Of Rothschild, or the Barings."

In what condition of life, all other things being equal, does the poor man find himself on terms of equality with the affluent? In what race can he outstrip, nay, keep equal pace. The rich author will acquire fame before the poor one can find a publisher, yet their works shall be of equal merit! The rich professional man will leave his poor compeer far behind. The poor are much oftener the dupes of circumstance, because necessity steps in and kicks the beam against them. He who has little, and has therefore, most need that that little shall go as far as possible, pays quite as much, if not more, for any article, than they who could better afford it. The man of wealth buys place and station. the man of poverty is lucky if he keeps his own. Certainly, this is not right. In other matters, it is considered the part of high honor to protect the weak against the strong. Here the reverse is practised—the strong are made stronger, the weak weaker, until they fall by scores in the unequal contest. Now there is no evil so great or so strongly entrenched in the heart, but that it is, at some point assailable; so is this. If we could do away with a portion of the fictitious consequence which is attached to wealth, we should then do away with one of the strongest incentives to its acquisition, as an end. The cause and the effect would fall together. It is in vain to attempt to get rid of the latter while the former remains. While this standard of judgment continues, so long will men, urged on by so many promptings, strive to conform themselves to it, in many instances at ruinous, in all, at greater or less sacrifice.

Again, wealth gives to its possessor many advantages, and the absence of it subjects the child of poverty to many inconveniences, which are not to be expressed in the language of dollars and cents, and which have no place in commercial dictions-ries. The rich take airs upon themselves by reason of their possessions. The poor are depressed by the harrowing thought that they are ever suspected of poverty. Here, both are at fault.—Wealth is often unmindful of obligation, because it knows that it will not be regarded as the result of necessity. Poverty, to avoid uncharitable suspicions, often entails lasting anxiety and pain upon itself, to save appearances. It would naturally be thought that the consciousness of power, in this respect, would be the parent of magnanimity and not of an overbearing spirit—that it would take the weak and timid by the hand and lead them over the rough places of the world, and not put its iron heel upon their neck. Who, than the rich, can better afford to be generous and kindly thoughtful of the less fortunate? And sometimes they are—but are they always, often, so? How often does purse-proud arrogance cast its rude unfeeling jibe against the delicate texture of some sensitive nature, or vaunt its wealth and its splendor in the presence of the destitute? It need not always be spoken, it may be acted as well as expressed. How often does ostentation take an airing in its gilded coach, for no higher motive, than to excite the wonder of the multitude. The effect of this want of a magnanimous spirit is the deprivation of many pleasures which persons of limited means might otherwise enjoy. The delights of a general social intercourse, are much more restricted among the latter than they would be, had not the aristocracy of wealth ordained that they should be attended by expensive ceremonial. Costly entertainments, rare viands, wines whose parent grape was empurpled beneath most genial skies, luxuriant decoration, all delightful, and well no doubt, in themselves, when justly enjoyed, can, necessarily, only be furnished by the affluent.—These, the large majority are utterly unable to give, and though they may be possessed of equally high culture, refinement and taste, pride will not permit them to entertain, for the simple reason that they cannot come up to that standard which custom has partially ordained, or if they do, it is at unwise sacrifices in other directions. That this is a most foolish false pride—a feeling which implies a most glaring defect of true self respect, all will readily admit, but we must take human nature as we find it, and not rail because it is so perverse, but on the contrary, furnish occasional aid to relieve it of some portion of its self-inflicted embarrasements.

Unfortunately for pride, wealth is not always its accompaniment, and we therefore may always expect to see between it and poverty, a state of continual antagonism until man is wiser than he is now. Still let us labor for reform, we may not complete anything, and yet ours may be that intermediate assistance, indispensible to final success.

To whom may we naturally look for assistance in this matter? Who may do it with least inconvenience? The rich may sometimes make a little sacrifice—may make a concession to weakness if you please to call it, without suspicion that it is done from necessity, and in this way furnish an escape from the embarrasments of pride, which may break but will not stoop. The same man may be humble and docile as a child before his Maker, and unyielding as rock when his fellow demands submission. He will bow his lip to the dust before the Being who is superior, high over all, but to an equal, he will never yield the right of supremacy. There may be something worthy of thought in this idea. Social pleasures do not altogether consist in eating and drinking and should be freed from all shackles and impediments to general enjoyment. Of a truth, great riches entail great responsibilities, and fortunate is he who wisely uses them. I am firmly persuaded that in numberless instances, a kindlier disposition would be made of them, did their possessors know how much happiness they might effect—how much misery relieve. Placed, themselves in an atmosphere above want, their association being mostly with those in the same condition, they are absolutely ignorant of—do not realize the actual existence of those gaunt spectres that inhabit the regions beneath. If they would look, they would see them, and seeing them, such is my faith in humanity, I am persuaded they would relieve.

I will not speak of any of those thousand causes of commisseration which at once, so naturally present themselves; their enumeration would be but trite and familiar. But there are some which lie deeper than the surface and are therefore not so obvious. Much delicacy is oftentimes necessary in the assistance of those who would recoil from the touch of direct and open charity as from the sting of asps; they may not be assisted, in terms, but will consent to be put in a way to assist themselves. In this manner pride, self respect, and the dread of pity which is so terrible to the lofty, even though scathed and desolate heart, are left impaired. And these may, in all likelihood, be the very persons who would gladly have assisted others had fortune smiled upon them, but disease struck them down in mid-career, and they are powerless, surrounded only by the fragments of shattered hopes. Or perchance, the mind may have lost its balance-tone, and this harp, with its golden chords and frets of fire, instead of breathing forth angelic symphonies, may now have become "like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh." Are not these wrecks worth seeking out?

But my subject is so prolific in suggestions (I have long since despaired of treating it with any thing like even an abridged completeness,) that I find it difficult to decide what to accept or what to reject. Literally I may say that I am struggling with the embarrassments of riches. Suffer me briefly to glance at two or three other considerations, and I close.

Among the many curious phases which the making of wealth presents, there is none more striking than that which it wears, when it carries its privileges and prerogatives, natural and usurped, into the temple dedicated to the worship of God.—That man should wish to stand high in the estimation of his fellows, and should seek such means as, according to the standard of human judgment, will ensure success, is most natural. But that he should desire to make it subserve his own aggrandizement in that place, of all others, is one of the marvels which human action alone is capable of furnishing. Yet wealth there claims its vested privileges, title deeds for exclusive right of occupancy of certain places, are as common as that by which we hold our workshops and our dwellings—the law stands by with its hundred hands, ready to lay hold upon any intruder into these several precincts firmed out for the cultivation of the gospel, the same as the violation of any monied interest, and the great State of New York which wears upon its official crest the proud motto "Excelsior," recognizes in its statute books, this right of property, by providing, but with a kind of mock ludicrous gravity, that a seat or pew occupied by a person or his family in any house or place of public worship "shall not be sold for the payment of his debts." Bountiful provision, which, while it sells the hearth-stone and the roof-tree of his dwelling, will not yet strip him of the legal privilege of learning the way to Heaven! In some churches this extravagant generosity of wealth is carried to the pitch of parcelling out obscure portions and by places for the poor! What do we see in all this? Is there not here a kind of deification of gold through the privileges it bestows? Do people forget the language of indignant rebuke uttered by the Savior, when he overturned the tables of the money changers and cast out those who bought and sold doves? Do they remember that they go up to the temple to worship Him, who while on earth, had not where to lay his head, and yet was ministered unto by legions of glittering angels? Do they think that high places in church are correlative with high places in Heaven. In the eye of Him whom they serve, do they forget that all, so far as lands or gold are concerned, are alike rich—alike poor? Do they think that the immortality of those who occupy poor pews is of second rate quality, and would they show "them the rough and thorny path to Heaven, while they the primrose path of dalliance tread." Is there then no place on this earth where men may assemble together on terms of equality and not be judged by the weight of their money bags? Alas! we know not where to find it, since the temple of Jehovah is not the place. Wealth does usurp and enforce privileges there. We are opposed, in toto, to the close church system—to all vested rights and monied privileges thereto appertaining. Let the wealth of the rich build them. Health, intelligence Heaven has given them the means. Let all assist in proportion to their ability; but above all, let them be free. Let not the poor man when he enters feel cowed by the idea that he is a trespasser: let him feel that he is a beggar of God for his blessing, and not of man for a spot on which to kneel. Let not those of delicate moral organization fear to be jostled by the vicious and depraved. A church is not their ordinary lounging places. If by accident they find themselves there, give them a place. It may win them, per chance, to come again. But it may be asked, how can a church be supported? I answer: those who give now for the love of giving, will continue to give, while the efficacy of the gifts of those who make them because they are to get their money back, or for appearance's sake, may well be doubted. Hypocrisy never yet benefitted any cause, while true christianity will always find a pert exponent in the measure of her charity.

In reference to legislation, too, we regard that principle as vicious which looks rather to the wealth of a nation than the men of the nation. Man is the prime object of governmental care—other things are but incidents Look at the history of our legislature and politics for the last twenty years, and what features do they present so absorbing and controlling as questions of banking and tariffs. These doubtless bear upon man in his most intimate relations; but the money comes first, the man afterwards. True our country has not been backward in matters of science, education and philanthropy—in the latter without a parallel—but it is submitted that the money peaks loom high in both State and National horizon. And gold may be seen marching with front unabashed up to the very altar of love, thrusting a mercenary chill into the inner sanctuary of the heart. There is a class of men called fortune hunters, who are said to be able to detect its presence with an instinct as unerring as that which guides the bird to its appointed home, though surrounded by clouds and rolling tempests, and this presence it is fabled, is sufficient to invest the plain with a robe of beauty and to throw over the object of their adoration a halo of supernatural light, like that with which the golden flush of a summer sunset bedecks the brow of evening. But this is dangerous ground. Let me retreat from it quickly as I may; but like the Parthians of old, shoot one arrow as I fly. If the eyes of the gentlemen are sometimes bewildered by the dazzling light of gold, gallantry itself may be permitted to say that the ladies are not altogether indifferent to the charms of a splendid establishment.

And yet it is pleasant to remember, amid the intricacy of these mazes, that mind, not money, has shaped out the progress of the world—that mind has been the controlling. all things else the subservient agencies. To this thought we may go back, as to a fountain, and drink deep draughts of hope, when, almost choked with the dust of gold in the struggle of life, we fancy for a moment that it is losing the supremacy. It is this which has given wisdom and dignity to pursuit, and imparted a fresh majesty to life. It is this which gives us the dearest joys that grow in earthly soil. Homer, "the blind old man of Scio's rocky Isle," begged his bread; yet how more than kingly —how eternal his fame. Shakspeare and Milton are still living in the echoes of their own divine music.

The fame of Bacon, Newton and Galileo will continue green while mind shall love to scale the heights of Philosophy, or the stars shall harmoniously roll through their heavenly pathways: And Franklin's eulogy shall be re written in every lightning flash. Mind is the impress of the Godhead, stamped upon man at his creation, and this immortal, sentient principle, shall live when the forms in which it was shrined shall have mouldered in the bosom of their mother earth, and the gains for which they toiled been scattered never more to be reunited, leaping even to a higher life and nobler powers, when

> "Like the baseless fabric of this vision,
> The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself
> Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
> And, like this unsubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a rack behind."

Shocking Anecdote.—At a Teacher's Meeting in Springfield, Mr. Sweetzer, in an eloquent Speech, illustrated the force of example by the following striking anecdote:

A painter while journeying, accidentally fell in with a most beautiful child, and was so enraptured with its countenance that he immediately resolved to paint it, and carried his determination into execution. Hanging the painting in his studio, he made it his guardian angel, and when he was desponding or angry, sought encouragement and calmness in gazing into its beautiful face. He thought that if he could ever meet with his counterpart, he would paint that also. Years passed away, and the painter succeeded in finding one so ugly-looking as to satisfy his idea of an opposite to his darling picture. By chance, while visiting a prison, after having almost given up in despair he saw a young man stretched upon the floor of his cell in a perfect paroxysm of rage. This struck him as his desideratum; and he lost no time in transferring the face to canvass, and placing it side by side with his ideal of purity, innocence and beauty. And who, think you, was the original of his last painting? The same that when a child, had furnished him with his long-cherished and beautiful picture, the innocent, happy and darling babe. The change had been wrought by teachings he had been subjected to, and the examples set before them. "Let us," said Mr. Sweetzer, "take warning from this lesson, and do what we can to rescue angels from becoming fiends."—Springfield Republican.

Report of the May Exhibition of the Buffalo Horticultural Society.

In making up a report of the May Exhibition, being the first regular show of 1848, the Committee may be pardoned for taking a short retrospect of past labors. It is now just about three years since the first meeting was held in this city preparatory to the formation of a Horticultural Society. The low state of the science here at that time showed the necessity for such a movement, and its rapid rise and extension since our establishment, has amply demonstrated the usefulness and important bearing a well conducted Horticultural Society may have not only upon the elegancies but the comforts of a people. The various exhibitions of the Society have been constantly progressive—each succeeding exhibition has developed new beauties in the floral world, and new sources of gratification in vegetable culture.

The MAY Exhibition in this section must necessarily be rather a meagre one, as compared with the gorgeous displays of June, and the succeeding months. In May, with us there are but few out-door flowers in fine bloom, except the bulbs, and of these, (where we are confined to but one show per month,) only a part can be shown. The beautiful variety of Hyacinths, which are now extensively cultivated here, were completely out of bloom at the time of our exhibition. The Tulip family was well represented, however, and as will be seen by our detailed report, numerous other of Flora's choicest gems graced the tables of the Hall of Exhibition.

The following were the principal contributors:

Rev. Dr. Shelton—Four bouquets of Tulips, comprising some fifteen varieties. Pronounced by general consent the finest in the exhibition.

Mrs. George B. Webster—Two bouquets Tulips, fourteen varieties, including among many very superb, the Parrot Tulip, of splendid colors and fine size.

Mrs. H. Shumway—Several beautiful bouquets, containing Tulips, Narcissus and cut flowers in variety. Mrs. S. is celebrated for the beauty and perfection of her Narcissus.

Miss Hannah Hart—A superb Cactus in full bloom. Also, a beautiful bouquet of green-house flowers, comprising the Amie Vibert, Agripina and White Daily Roses, Oleanders, Abutilon, Cinerarias, &c. Also two pretty bouquets of Tulips, Seringas, Honeysuckles, &c.

Miss Mary E. Davis—Two choice bouquets of rich exotics. Also a splendid bouquet of Tulips in variety.

Mrs. H. W. Rogers—A large bouquet, very tastefully made up, comprising Tea Roses, Rose Acacia, Seringas, Tulips, &c.

Miss E. A. Bristol—A pretty bouquet of Tulips, Narcissus, Amaranthus, Verbenas, &c.

Miss Sarah Burrows—A beautiful bouquet, comprising Calla Ethiopa, Calceolaria, Cinerarias, Verbenas, &c., made up in artistic style.

Miss Fox—Two fine bouquets of Tulips in variety, and other cut flowers.

Mrs. Stebbins, of Lancaster—A fine bouquet of Tulips, Globe Amaranthus, Rose Acacia, &c.

Miss Ida Mann—A pretty bouquet of Tulips, Seringas, Corchorus, &c.

"Mr. John Bull, by proxy"—A beautiful floral design, of choice exotics. Very much admired.

Mrs. Lewis Eaton—A floral design, beautifully executed, comprising Convolaria, Pansies, Lichnidas, &c. &c. Also three elegant bouquets.

Capt. A. E. Hart—Some beautiful bouquets from his conservatory at Cold Spring, including many choice varieties Roses, &c. &c.

Mrs. Pamela Staats—Some choice bouquets of Tulips and other flowers.

Mrs. S. W. Hawes—A "Tom Thumb" Orange Tree, in full bearing, about 10 inches in height.

Miss Sarah Burrows—Three fine house-plants in good order, viz: Calla Ethiopia, Tongue Aloe, in bloom, and Magnolia.

Miss Catharine Ketchum—Bouquet of Pansies, of fine color and size.

Miss Harriet Efner—An elegant bonquet.

Miss Grace Bird, Black Rock—Two very elegant bouquets.

Miss C. N. Bristol—A beautiful boquet.

Mrs. Wm. Coleman—A Monthly or Everlasting Pink, in full bloom.

Mrs. Dr. A. Flint—An immense Pelargonium, showing fine cultivation.

Mrs. J Dart—A fine specimen of the Pelargonium in flower.

Mr. W. R. Coppock—The contributions of our indefatigable President formed no small feature in the exhibition. The green-house plants not only were of choice varieties but fine specimens of their kinds. A splendid Abutilon Striata, 8 feet high, yet perfectly symmetrical and in full bloom, elicited general admiration, as did also a Cactus Speciosa, engrafted upon the common Opuntia, and in fine growth and bloom. Mr. C. also presented sixteen varieties of Pelargoniums, or Geraniums, in full bloom, four varieties choice Roses, two varieties Fuchsias, the Pomegranate, Adder Tongue, and Cactus Flageliformis in full bloom.

Mr. B. Hodge, of Buffalo Nursery, presented three splendid varieties of Cactus, including a fine specimen of the Speciocissima in full bloom. Also the Chromatella and Devoniensis Roses, five Bouquets, containing superb Tulips in variety, the Double Flowering Apple, a new variety of the Lilac, &c. &c.

Mr. Elihu Tyler, of Tyler's Garden, on North street, near Delaware, made a magnificent display of green-house plants. Mr. T. has probably been the most successful propagator of new varieties of Geraniums in this section. His new seedlings, the Buena Vista, Gen. Scott, Gen. Taylor, &c., were generally admired for their fine colors, vigorous growth and perfect form. In addition to numerous Geraniums, Mr. Tyler exhibited a fine Orange Tree in full fruit, Amaryllis in bloom, Nereum Splendens, numerous choice Roses, Verbenas, Cinerarias, Petunias, &c., and some really splendid bouquets made up from his green-house.

In addition to the above Mr. Geo. B. Webster presented a bunch of Giant Rhuburb, of fine growth.

Mr. Lewis Eaton—A bunch of exceedingly fine Asparagus. Gen. Eaton is rapidly becoming known as one of our most successful horticulturists.

Mr. Peter Curtiss—Three bunches of fine Rhubarb.

Mr. James H. Watts, of Rochester—Some fine specimens of the Northern Spy, Canada Red, and Esopus Spitzenberg Apples, in fine preservation. Mr. Watts is an ardent and enthusiastic pomologist, and is doing much toward raising the standard of fruit culture in Western New York.

Mr. W. R. Coppock—Newtown Pippin, Dominie, Roxbury Russet and Canada Red Apples, in fine preservation.

The above comprise all the contributions at the May show. To the Ladies' Committee, who promptly responded to the first call of the season, the thanks of the Society are cordially accorded—a continuance of the same spirit will carry us through the season with usefulness and credit.—The coming June Show will, however, task all our energies; the June Exhibition is, or should be, par excellence, THE show of the season. Thus far every thing bids fair—we have had a genial spring, and the summer's sun promises to ripen rich treasures for the lovers of the truly beautiful. Our ladies must bear this in mind and we may look for an Exhibition the present month which shall be an era in the annals of Horticulture in Buffalo.

For the Committee,
C. F. S. THOMAS, Chairman.

WHAT THE S. S. MISSIONARY DOES.—The extract below is from the last Annual Report of the American Sunday School Union, which will be ready for distribution in a few days:—Boston Traveller.

"In establishing new schools and supplying them with books, we suppose our missionary is doing a work which no one else is likely to do better. If there are other means of accomplishing the same object in a given place, it is his business to seek places where no such other means exist, and which we know, and he knows, are to be found all over his field of labor. Now is that service needful? If so, to what extent? Do we overrate its value or necessity? Can we modify the plan so as to render it more appropriate or efficient, or less costly? We think not. We have always supposed that a Sunday School, established on Union principles and supplied with a judicious assortment of Union books, was an invaluable accession to a neighborhood where no stated permanent religious privileges are enjoyed. We have supposed, that in the absence of an organized church and an evangelical minister and the more general influences of the gospel, a little perennial fountain of good might be opened, in the form of a Sunday School, that might supply some of the cravings of a child's moral nature. If only a few of Watt's Divine Songs were learned, and a few passages of scripture, (like the decalogue, or the sermon on the mount,) and all from dictation, it would be something gained from an absolute waste of mind and heart! We are aware, of course, that the influence of an education and pious ministry is all-important to give stability and permanency to any and all of the achievements of Christian benevolence, and even to the common pursuits of life. God's arrangements for this end are too obvious to be overlooked or mistaken.—But how many neighborhoods are there unsupplied with the blessings of such a ministry? To these places our missionary wends his way, with such helps as our benevolent friends enable us to afford him. He gathers together from 20 to 50 children in the best place he can find, and persuades one or more adults, that may have even the semblance of qualifications, to adopt the school as their own, and do what they can to sustain it. If we only distribute over such a neighborhood so much moral influence as the keeping of such a school for twelve successive Sabbaths would diffuse, (connected, as it would be, with the books and tracts, and conversations and associations to which such an event would give birth,) we suppose we have done a great good there; and if our mission ceases at that stage, the servant of Christ who next visits them will find several verdant little spots, which the overflowings of our Sunday School rill has made green, and the possession of which will be of great advantage to him and his work. So we have been assured, times without number, by ministers and laymen, by individuals and associations, by men of all Christiann denominations. Have we exaggerated the value of these preliminary and elementary labors? Is not this a work that the moral husbandman must have done to his hands, before the seed can be generally sown with a reasonable prospect of a harvest?"

Monument to DeWitt Clinton.

It will be gratifying to the people of the Empire State, says the Albany Evening Journal of the 31st, to know that this long act of delayed justice towards one to whom she is so much indebted for that proud title, is about to be undertaken in a manner to insure its satisfactory completion.

The Evening Journal says that the Trustees of the "Clinton Monument Association" met in April and organized under the act of incorporation passed in February last, the Hon. WM. C. BOUCK being appointed President. Four quarterly meetings in each year are to be held, on the second Tuesdays of August and February at the city of Albany, and of May and November at the city of New York.

The Journal also remarks as follows:

An adjourned meeting of the Trustees was held at the Capitol (Albany) on Tuesday. Upon the invitation of T. W. Olcott and M. T. Reynolds, Esqrs., in behalf of the citizens, the Trustees visited the Albany Rural Cemetery, with a view to examine the appropriateness of its grounds for the site of the proposed Monument. Upon their return, a committee of three of their number was appointed to ascertain as to the expense, form and material of the Monument, and as to the terms, &c., of obtaining suitable grounds for its erection, and to report thereon at the next quarterly meeting in August. Messrs Bradish, Parmelee and Fillmore were appointed as such committee.

After adopting a resolution that at the August meeting, the location of the Monument should be determined, the Association adjourned.

The whole matter appears therefore to be in a proper train for efficient prosecution and satisfactory consummation. The character of the gentlemen to whose hands as Trustees it is now entrusted, will be with the public a sufficient guaranty for such a result, as will be alike creditable to the people of the State and to the memory of the illustrious Statesman who so well merits from them every tribute due to departed excellence.

In determining the plan as well as locality of the proposed Monument, the public will have entire confidence, without doubt, in the taste, intelligence and judgment of the gentlemen upon whom the determination of these matters devolves, and will be disposed to leave them to the exercise of their own discretion.

Five towns in England, namely, London, Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool and Leeds, containing 96,000 acres, nearly the area of Rutlandshire, have a population equal to Bedfordshire, Hants, Suffolk, Sussex, Berks, Bucks, Herts, Cambridge, Dorset, Cumberland, Oxford, Westmoreland, Hereford, Northamptonshire and North and East Yorkshire—more than 10,000,000 acres, or one-third of all England. The above towns also contain more inhabitants than Scotland with its 19,000,000 of acres.

Proverbial Philosophy.

Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy: a book of tho'ts and arguments originally treated. Also, a Thousand Lines and other Poems. By MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER. Latest American edition. Buffalo, George H. Derby & Co. publishers. 1848.

A publishing house in our young city is almost a new thing. We are glad to be able to point to even one. GEORGE H. DERBY & Co. successors to DERBY & HEWSON, are the only book sellers in the city who have as yet gone into the book manufacture to any great extent. They have commenced the business in earnest, and their issues are characterized by excellency in the books themselves and by neatness and stability in their externals. The book before us we take pride in noticing. It may be called a Buffalo book. Aside from being published here, it was printed on a Buffals press, (the new improved power press of Messrs. JEWETT, THOMAS & Co.) and the paper on which it is printed was manufactured by Messrs. BRADLEY BROTHERS, of the Buffalo Paper Mills. We seldom receive a volume of poetry from any of the eastern houses which presents a finer appearance than this. Of its contents it seems almost supererogatory to speak.—Every body has heard of it; almost every body has seen and read it; and every body should own it. Replete with the pearls of golden thought, one reads it with instruction and delight, and rises from its perusal elevated in feeling and with a soul full of high resolves.

Opening the volume at random, our eye lights upon a marked passage or two on Love, with which we cannot refrain from enriching our columns:

"Love:—what a volume in a word, an ocean in a tear,
A seventh heaven in a glance, a whirlwind in a sigh,
The lightning in a touch, a millenium in a moment:
What consecrated joy or woe in blest or blighted love!
For it is that native poetry springing up indigenous to Mind,
The heart's own-country music, thrilling all its chords,
The story without an end that angels throng to hear,
The word, the king of words, carved on Jehovah's heart!
Oh! call thou snake-eyed malice mercy, call envy honest praise,
Count selfish craft for wisdom, and coward treachery for prudence,
Do homage to blaspheming unbelief as to bold and free philosophy,
And estimate the recklessness of license as the right attribute of liberty,—
But with the world, thou friend and scholar, stain not this pure name;
Nor suffer the majesty of Love to be likened to the meanness of desire:
For Love is no more such, than seraphs' hymns are discord,
And such is no more Love, than Ætna's breath is summer.

* * * * * * * * * *

If the love of the heart is blighted, it buddeth not again;
If that pleasant song is forgotten, it is to be learnt no more:
Yet often will thought look back, and weep over early affection;
And the dim notes of that pleasant song will be heard as a reproachful spirit,
Moaning in Æolian strains over the desert of the heart,
Where the hot soroccos of the world have withered its one oasis."

It would seem needless to make further extracts, for those of our readers who have not obtained the book, will be likely to purchase it.

THE GERMANIA AND AGRICOLA OF CAIUS CORNELIUS TACITUS, with notes for Colleges. By W. S. TAYLOR. New Edition. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1848.

Macaulay pronounces Tacitus the greatest of Latin historians—not even excepting Thucidides. Notwithstanding his occasional want of simplicity and perspicuity—which Professor TAILOR acknowledges are among his faults—his descriptions are so graphic, his style is so vigorous and pointed, and his sentiments are so free from that obscenity which mars the pages of Juvenel and some of his contemporaries, that he well deserves a front seat in the affections of the classic student. "No hasty perusal, no single reading of Tacitus," says Professor T., "will give a just conception of the surpassing richness of his works. They must be studied profoundly to be appreciated. They are a mine of wisdom, of vast and unknown depth, whose treasures lie chiefly beneath the surface, imbedded in the solid rock, which must be entered with mining implements, explored with strong lights, and its wealth brought up by severe toil and sweat."—With these facts before him, let the student address himself to the Germania and Agricola with good courage, and he will get amply rewarded.

FUNERAL ORATION ON THE DEATH OF THOMAS COLE.—We have received from the press of D. APPLETON & Co., New York, a beautifully printed copy of a funeral oration, occasioned by the death of THOMAS COLE. It was delivered before the National Acdemy of Disign of New York, May 4th, 1848, by WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT. It is the tribute of a poetic genius to the worth and memory of an artistic genius; and when we say that Mr. BRYANT has discharged his solemn duty in a manner worthy of himself, nothing more need be said.—Copies of the Oration are for sale at Peck's Bookstore.

THE HERALD OF TRUTH. — A copy of this monthly periodical, published at Cincinnati, Ohio, and edited by L. A. HINE, lies before us. It coutains some good articles and some very bad—on the whole we think it as much the "herald" of falsehood as of "truth." The editor says in his motto that true philosophy has power to redeem every human being! If brother HINE uses the word "redeem" in its common acceptation, he may yet find that his true philosophy is a dumb ass that cannot utter a syllable for man's redemption. Christianity is the world's only hope in this great mission, and she is rapidly doing the work. Her messengers are abroad in the earth: their "feet" are beautiful upon the mighty prairies of the West, and upon the pagan "mountains" of the East. Humble in heart and energetic in spirit, they go on foot, scorning to ride your obstinate beast in their haste to discharge the duties of their high calling.

THE ANNUAL REVIEW OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT took place on Monday afternoon. The several companies appeared in new dresses, and presented a truly beautiful appearance. We doubt if there is a more efficient or orderly fire department in the country than ours.

FRANCE.—LOUIS BLANC is still at liberty, though ho is suspected of promoting the outbreak.

The invasion of the Assembly was the result of a regularly organized conspiracy, intended to break out at Paris, Lyons, and probably other places, at the same moment.

M. ROBRIER nas the chief conspiaitor. The allegiance of the troops of the line and of the National Guards is fully depended on, and M. LAMARTINE's popularity has been effectually restored.

Gen. CAVAIGNAC has been appointed Minister of War.

One account from Paris says Louis Blanc was still at liberty, and another that he has been arrested, and still another that he had fled.

The strongest means had been adopted to prevent a recurrence of physical display by the members of the secret clubs.

Advices as late as the evening of the 18th state that the city had been perfectly tranquil during the day.

After the mob had been driven out of the hall of the National Assembly on the 15th, they marched to the Hotel de Ville.

Citizen Soubrier in the interim repaired to the Minister of the interior with his Montaguards,—He demanded admittance and the transfer of Ministry to him, and of the military posts to his faithful followers. He was admitted only to be arrested. His hundred partizans were disarmed even of their scarlet cravats and turned adrift.

After the Chamber of Deputies and the Hotel de Ville had been purged of their new occupants and after the arrest of several parties connected with the attempted revolution, who had in the first instance escaped, all Paris presented masses of National Guards, moving in columns of thousands to the great points of the city. The people of all classes, with here and there a solitary exception, cheering them on. During the night several regiments of the line marched to the capital. The Republican Guard or corps formed at the revolution and only subject to the orders of the Prefect of Police, was ordered by the Executive Committee to be disbanded, but this troop had refused to quit the Prefecture, or to allow the National Guard to enter it. They declined even to obey any verbal orders from their chief, M. Causcidiere who was then at the Assembly. They declared that they would not move till M. Causcidiere himself came to order them. The contest continued for several hours, during which a great military force gathered aroundt he prefecture, at 4 o'clock 10000 men surrounded it. They admitted some detachments of the National Guard within the building. During the night, however, the neighborhood continued as before to be occupied by the troops who bivouacked in the streets. The number of prisoners at Vincennes is 67—33 are under arrest at the Hotel de Ville.

Advices of the 17th state that things begin to assume the aspect of civil order. The walls have been placarded with an apologetic manifesto from M. Causcidiere in which he endeavors to defend himself.

Ledru Rollin was arrested—his name having been on the list of the pretended government, but Lamartine becoming responsible for him he was released.

Seventy-five of the body guard kept by the clubbist Soubrier in the house of the Rue de Rivoli, were arrested in the same house.

A large quantity of arms and ammunition was found.

Persons who were in the room with M. Barbiere were also arrested and conducted to prison.

On many persons were found pistols and daggers, and on some letters from the chiefs of the plot.

One of the persons arrested had a paper in his hand which he thrust into his mouth and tried to swallow, but being seized by the throat he was obliged to give up, and turned out to be a list of the chief conspirators.

ELDER KNAPP.—We understand that this somewhat noted preacher is now holding a sort of protracted meeting at the First Baptist Church. He preached three times on Sunday, and we hear that he will preach every afternoon and evening during the week. He has had considerable success in waking people up at the East, and perhaps he may be equally successful here.—Chicago Tribune, 30th.

Relief for Oregon.

The following is a copy of the message sent to Congress on Monday by the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress the accompanying memorial and papers, which have been transmitted to me by a special messenger, employed for that purpose by the Governor and "Legislative Assembly of Oregon Territory," who constitute the temporary government which the inhabitants of that distant region of our country have, from the necessity of their condition, organized for themselves. The memorialists are citizens of the United States. They express ardent attachment to their native land, and in their present perilous and distressed situation they earnestly invoke the aid and protection of their Government.

They represent that "the proud and powerful tribes of Indians," residing in their vicinity, have recently raised "the war-whoop and crimsoned their tomahawks in the blood of their citizens;" that they apprehend that "many of the powerful tribes inhabiting the upper valley of the Columbia have formed an alliance for the purpose of carrying on hostilities against their settlements;" that the number of the white population is far "inferior to that of the savages; that they are deficient in arms and money, and fear that they do not possess strength to repel the "attack of so formidable a foe and protect their families and property from violence and rapine." They conclude their appeal to the Government of the United States for relief by declaring: "If it be at all the intention of our honored parent to spread her guardian wing over her sons and daughters in Oregon, she surely will not refuse to do it now, when they are struggling with all the ills of a weak and temporary government, and when perils are daily thickening around them and preparing to burst upon their heads. When the ensuing Summer's sun shall have dispelled the snow from the mountains we shall look with glowing hope and restless anxiety for the coming of your laws and your arms."

In my message on the 5th of August, 1846, communicated "a copy of the convention to the settlement and adjustment of the Oregon boundary," I recommended to Congress that "provision should be made by law at the earliest practicable period for the organization of a territorial government in Oregon." In my annual message of December, 1846, and again in December, 1847, this recommendation was repeated.

The population of Oregon is believed to exceed twelve thousand souls, and it is known that it will be increased by a large number of emigrants during the present season, The facts set forth in the accompanying memorial and papers show that the dangers to which our fellow-citizens are exposed are so imminent, that I deem it to be my duty again to impress on Congress the strong claim which the inhabitants of that distant country have to the benefit of our laws and the protection of our Government.

I therefore again invite the attention of Congress to the subject, and recommend that laws be proptly passed establishing a Territorial Government, and granting authority to raise an adequate volunteer force for the defence and protection of its inhabitants. It is believed that a regiment of mounted men, with such additional force as may be raised in Oregon, will be sufficient to afford the required protection. It is recommended that the forces raised for this purpose should engage to serve for twelve months, unless sooner discharged. No doubt is entertained, with proper inducements in land bounties, such a force can be raised in a short time. Upon the expiration of their service many of them will doubtless desire to remain in the country and settle upon the land which which they may receive as bounty.

It is deemed important that provision be made for the appointment of a suitable number of Indian agents to reside among the various tribes in Oregon, and that appropriations be made to enable them to treat with these tribes, with a view to restore and preserve peace between them and the white inhabitants.

Should the laws recommended be promptly passed, the measures for their execution may be completed during the prent session, and before the severity of winter will interpose obstacles in crossing the Rocky Mountains. If not promptly passed a delay of another year will be the consequence, and may prove destructive to the white settlements in Oregon. JAMES K. POLK.

Methodist General Conference.

PITTSBURG, May 30—10 o'clock P. M.

The Conference has this day made the following appointments. I comply with your wishes, and send them by telegraph for publication in the Commercial Advertiser in advance. They will surprise many, perhaps most, of your readers, and will be, in some instances at least, at variance with public expectation.

New Yorkers, I think, will hail them with very general satisfaction and approval. They have not been made hastily or without concert and full consideration. One or two of them have a meaning which cannot fail to strike you. Change of officers, you will observe, is very general. I do not like to put you to telegraphic expense for mere opinions, or I could say a good deal.

A ROCKY MOUNTAIN TEAM AND ESCORT.—A "team" passed through our streets eastwardly, last Saturday, which attracted no little attention. It was conducted by two hardy-looking, weather-beaten, middle-aged men. A wagon, of a rude, substantial kind, covered over with boards, was drawn by two yoke of sturdy oxen, and one yoke of young buffaloes. Three very large elk were led by ropes attached to the hinder part of the wagon. Within the box of the wagon were secured a great variety of Rocky Mountain "varmints," from the bald eagle and the goat, down to the prairie dog and the gopher. The proprietors would open their museum and let half a dozen boys have a peep for a shilling. They had all come from beyond the Rocky Mountains, and were journeying to the East, on a tour for speculation. We didn't enquire, but took them to be original yankees, as a matter of course.—*Cleve. JAPAN.—In the New Bedford Mercury of the 16th ult., are published the following interesting remarks:

The Polynesian alludes to the landing at Japan in April, 1847, of Capt. Jackson, of the whale ship Inez, of this port, under more favorable auspices than had before been allowed—(on which occasion, it may he recollected from an account recently copied in our columns, the Japanese appeared friendly, offered to supply him with wood and water, but would permit no further intercourse, and desired his departure,)—and thinks the signs of the times are threatening to the exclusive policy which has been so rigidly maintained hitherto by the Japanese government.

The Polynesian says, England, France and the United States ardently desire to effect a breach in this policy. They perhaps have too high a sense of national honor to do this by mere force of arms, but circumstances now appear to be preparing the way for their intervention in some shape. We believe the whaling fleet are destined to do something in this cause.

A new fishery has been opened in the Japan seas. Hundreds of enterprising whalers will, the ensuing season, cruise in all directions about their shores and in their bays, in search of their game. The Japanese have no naval force to enforce respect to their inter-channel rights. The doctrine of a close sea, however much they may desire to see preserved, they are powerless to enforce. The whalers will be tempted to land for wood, water, provisions, &c. Stress of weather, or some other contingency, may force some ashore. In this way some intercourse must be established. Humanity or necessity will demand it. Will the Japanese refuse? If they continue their policy of gratuitous hospitality, their patience may become exhausted at the increasing demand upon it, or their cupidity may be awakened to receive something in return. If they abuse those who may thus be placed within their power, they afford the pretext which is so eagerly desired, for interference on the part of some foreign power. If they commence trading in any way, the door for innovation is opened, and it will never be closed. Junks in distress will undoubtedly be met with by whalers. In case of such an event, we hope the master will have public spirit enough to carry the crew with as much of the merchandise as he can save to its port of destination.

Such honorable conduct will favorably impress the Japanese, and we feel sure the master who thus acts will not suffer in his interests by so doing. The Japanese merchants will appreciate the deed, and through them the government may become more lenient. If they should decline to receive the rescued property, or to pay a fair salvage, the master will then have a perfect right to it. But such a course cannot do otherwise than create a kindly feeling towards whaleships, and they may have occasion, cruising as they will in a comparatively unknown and dangerous sea, to require similar generosity at the hands of the Japanese. At all events, we hope masters of whale ships will lose no opportunity of favorably impressing the Japanese in regard to the respective nations they represent, and that they will make note of all information they can procure. Captain Jackson's examples in both these respects is deserving of commendation.—We have not a doubt that if he should by chance drop into the same bay again, his old friends would secretly be rejoiced to see him. From his journal, they evidently were pleased to have him there, but were afraid of their own government, and consequently made known to him with courtesy their wishes that he might leave.

"It would be good policy for the United States, England and France, to each keep a national vessel cruising in Japanese waters while the whaling fleet is there. Their presence might be productive of good to both parties, and they would familiarize the Japanese with the sight of their flags."

LAND REFORM.—A correspondent of the Newark Daily Advertiser, in an able article on the inconsistencies of the men who are making so much ado about land reform shows them up in the following style:

Again, according to this Procrustean system, men have just so much land and this must be inalienable. No man would be allowed to buy or sell. I must relate a story in point.

A clever farmer, who by the way owned a grist mill. was sent to the Legislature. He, like many before and since, resolved to be the father of some important measure. And so, while looking to the public good, and at the same time seeking his own ends, he resolved that the practice of bringing large salt sacks, holding four bushels, (too much for his miller to lift,) should be stopped. Accordingly, at the first opportunity, he introduced a bill, making it the duty of every man to bring his grain to the mill in bags not to exceed two bushels in capacity, and that in every case where they should exceed this quantity, the bag and grain should be forfeited to the miller. This ridiculous measure was put to rest in the following manner. One of the members proposed an additional section in about the following language:

"And be it further enacted, That in case any person shall carry to mill any bag containing less than two bushels the miller shall in every such case make up all such deficiency, so that there shall be uniformity, and every man have always two bushels of grain to be ground, no more and no less."

CELEBRATION IN BOSTON IN HONOR OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION IN 1792.—We abridge the account of this festival which the Hon. William Sullivan has given in his most interesting "Familiar Letters on Public Characters:"—

The demonstration was called a "Civic Feast," and all party distinctions were laid aside.

A whole ox, skinned and dressed, leaving the head and horns entire, and the eyes protruding from their sockets, was turned on a great wooden spit, before a furnace. When the animal was sufficiently roasted, he was placed upon a carriage and drawn through the principal streets, and was followed by two cartloads of bread, and two hogsheads of punch. An immense concourse of people attended.

The procession terminated in State street, where a table was laid, from the Eastern end of the City Eall to near Kilby street, and on this table it was intended that the friends of liberty should feast from the roasted ox. The scene soon changed; the cutting up and distributing of the animal became ridiculous and soon riotous.

The roasted fragments were thrown into the air, and hurled at female spectators, who thronged the balconies and crowded the windows. The celebration ended by the erection of a liberty pole, some 60 feet in length, in the space now known as Liberty square. The pole was surmounted with the horns of the roasted ox, and they remained uninjured for several years.

It is a remarkable fact, that this feast took place in Boston, on the same day that the head of Louis XVI. was severed from his body by the guillotine, in France.

A corduroy road has been discovered about two two feet and a half below the surface of the earth in Washington street, Boston.

PARIS, Friday noon, May 19.

The city continues tranquil. The Committees who have been charged with the duty of examining the projects of laws proposed by the Government, evince a decided disposition to sanction measures of unnecessary harshness towards the Royal Family, which has been formally exiled.

Among the members chosen to draw up the outline of a Constitution are Dubois, who was a special friend of Louis Philippe, and Odillon Barrot, who proposed the regency of the Dutchess of Orleans.

BERLIN, May 16.—The public mind is becoming more favorable to the return of the Prince of Prussia.

HAMBURGH, May 16.—There are vague rumors here of a serious action between the Prussians and the Danes before Frederica, in which the retreat of the body of 1000 Danes was cut off and nearly the whole made prisoners. VIENNA, May 14.—The Bank has improved in position, silver having arrived from London, and more confidence is entertained. The elections having taken a conservative turn all apprehension of interference of France in Italy has in some degree subsided. At the Wool Market held at Josdens, Hungary, there was a reduction of about 10 florins on last year's prices. Money is reported easier, and discount has fallen to 3½ per cent.

BORDEAUX.—The Branch Bank of France has commenced business, and 4 per cent. discount is fixed as the rate of discount on paper drawn upon all places where the Bank of France has branches. Bills at sight on the Bank in Paris are guaranteed free of charge to customers.

MURDER AND INCONSTANCY.—The trial of Jacob Houck, for the murder of Isaac D. Adkins, terminated at Fort Wayne, Indiana, on the 16th inst. Houck was found guilty and sentenced to be imprisoned at hard labor for life. The facts of the case, as provided in evidence, are:—Houck boarded with Adkins; a criminal attachment existed between him and Adkins' wife; he procured arsenic, which his guilty partner administered to her husband, and he sickened and died. Mrs. Adkins, after being arrested, was discharged. She immediately left the country, and has escaped for the present the punishment due her atrocious crime.

Extensive Fire in Allentown.

From the Philadelphia Inquirer, June 3d.

ALLENTOWN, June 1st, 1848.

The most beautiful and active part of our town lies in ashes. Fire, this awful calamity, has visited our peaceful town, wreaked its vengeance on its very heart, and left in a deplorable condition. The fire broke out in a frame stable near the centre of the town, at about three o'clock, this afternoon; there being a strong south-easterly wind, it spread with awful rapidity in that direction, and raged most vehemently until 5 o'clock.

The progress of the fire was arrested at about 5 o'clock. The loss is immense. The fire spread so rapidly that but very little of the store goods and other moveables were saved. The loss must at least be about $250,000. The stable where the fire originated is supposed to have been set on fire by boys playing in it with cigars and fire crackers

About one-third of the property destroyed was covered by insurance.

Since writing the above I have learned that upward of forty families were thrown out of their homes.

ACCIDENT AND NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.—We learn that an accident occurred upon the railroad yesterday afternoon about three miles this side of Canandaigua. The up train was proceeding west with eight emigrant and two passenger cars, when it came in contact with a snake-head the iron striking the seventh emigrant car and forcing its way through the bottom. In its course it came in contact with the right foot of a German woman, forcing the flesh from the bottom and side, mangling it pretty badly, and also bruising the sides of the legs below the knees. The bar then passed to the top of the car, grazing the head of a man in its course. Two emigrant and two passenger cars were thrown off the track against the bank, but no one was injured materially, except the woman referred to. The wonder is, that out of so many passengers, only one was hurt.—A similar fortunate escape could not have been anticipated one time out of a thousand. Had the bar which hit the man's forehead, varied its course an inch, it must inevitably have killed him in an instant.—Roch. Dai. Adv. 6*th*.

Mr. Upham accumulated his large property principally by loaning money and strict economy. At the time of his death, a large sum is said to have been owing him by residents of Claremont and the neighboring towns. His family expenses are reported to have been very small, seldom exceeding four or five hundred per annum, if they amounted to so much.

Moonlight on the Grave.

It shineth on the quiet grave
Where weary ones have gone;
It watcheth with angelic gaze
Where the dear are left alone;
And not a sound of busy life
To the still grave-yard comes,
But peacefully the sleepers lie
Down in their silent homes.

All silently and solemnly
It throweth shadows round,
And every grave-stone hath a trace
In darkness on the ground.
It looketh on the tiny mound
Where a little child is laid,
And lighteth up the noble pile
Which human pride hath made.

It falleth with unaltered ray,
On the simple and the stern,
And showeth with a solemn light
The sorrows we must learn.
It telleth of divided ties
On which its beams have shown;
It whispereth of heavy hearts,
Which "brokenly live on."

It gleameth where devoted ones
Are sleeping side by side;
It falleth where the maiden rests,
Who in her beauty died.
There is no grave in all the earth
That moonlight has not seen,
It gazeth cold and passionless
Where agony hath been.

Yet it is well! that changeless ray
A deeper thought should throw,
When mortal love pours forth the tide
Of unavailing woe.
It teacheth us no shade of grief
Can touch the starry sky;
That all our sorrow lieth here—
The glory is on high.

VOL. X. BUFFALO, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1848. NO. 20.

Demise of a Young Student.

He hath passed from the earth in the morning of life,
Ere the dew-drops of youth from his pathway had fled;
Ere the dark clouds of sorrow, in manhood so rife,
O'er his bosom the gloom of despondence had spread.

His dawn of existence was lovely and bright,
And the roseate morn sweetly opened to day;
While the sun of enjoyment poured on him its light,
And the fresh flowers of gladness sprang up in his way.

Thus cheerful and happy, in innocent joy,
Unheeded the days of his infancy flew,
No mildews of sickness to blight and destroy
The bright buds of promise that clustering grew.

With bosom elated he entered the field
Where Science her light and her treasures has strown;
But scarce were her gems to his vision revealed,
Ere the shade of the tomb o'er his future was thrown.

Consumption her hand on his vitals had laid,—
As a worm at the root did she silently prey;
And soon—with his buds of bright promise decayed—
Like a rose that is blighted, he faded away!

Yet why should we weep that his spirit is flown?
Why mourn that so briefly it tarried below?
For the glory of God on his vision had shone,
And the voice of his Savior had called him to go.

Then we may not in sadness lament o'er his doom,
Or sigh that the grave should his body enclose;
Nor moisten with tear-drops the flowerets that bloom
O'er the spot where in quiet his ashes repose.

1837. J. Clement.

Claudine.

A TALE.

"One day Love rode a butterfly, seeking a flowery shrine. The Heartsease withered as the god approached; the sly urchin smiled to see the ruin he had caused, then flew away. The Snowdrop could not stay his flight; she was too pale and scentless—Love needs return—requital. Upon a a sloping sunny bank a single Voilet raised its peerless head; thither flew Love; the perfume pleased him, and he thought to creep into the fragrant bell; but the wild wind rose, the tiny flower bent before the blast, and the coy god was gone. Love is too often but a sunshine friend. Long, long he fluttered near a graceful Rose; but her cup, so free and open, gave entrance to another —the roving Bee was welcome there; and Love must reign alone. Evening came on, Love was a-wearied, and his gay courser's pinions drooped. He saw a dim and melancholy flower—'Here will I rest,' quoth he. When in the Nightshade's gloomy folds Love sought repose and found oblivion."

"I see neither wit nor beauty in all that," said Claudine, as pettishly she threw away the book.

"There is, at any rate, a moral," replied her father, with a grave smile; "take care that you, Claudine, do not one day share the young god's fate, and, in spite of all your beauty, pass into oblivion."

Claudine thought there was no danger of anything of the kind; she was exceedingly pretty, her father considered rich, and the cold disdain with which it had hitherto pleased her to treat her admirers, seemed only to have increased their number

"I think it extremely foolish," she answered, "and I wonder who has had the impertinence to write such nonsense in my scrap-book."

There were no albums in those days.

"It is not unlike Philip de la Condamine's hand-writing," said a young companion; "I know his sisters well, and have often seen his letters to them. I am almost certain it is his."

"Philip de la Condamine—Philip de la Condamine!" exclaimed Claudine, still more offended than before; for Philip had red hair, his voice was harsh and inharmonious, he limped slightly in walking, his manners were abrupt, and there was in his whole deportment that awkward bashfulness we often see in persons sensible of bodily defects. Philip de la Condamine was, therefore, Claudine thought, the last man who should have ventured to teach her such a lesson; and she again repeated, that she thought he had been guilty of great impertinence.

"Philip is an excellent man," observed her father.

"I hate excellent men, especially if they have red hair," said Claudine, impatiently. Then taking the page from the book, she tore it into a thousand pieces, and, scattering them on the ground, proposed to her companions that they should betake themselves to the verandah.

Now it happened that Phllip de la Condamine had, on the preceeding evening, made proposals to Mr. Pierrepoint for his daughter's hand; the offer had been rejected; for, although Mr. Pierrepoint would gladly have accepted Philip for a son-in-law, he knew Claudine's feelings towards him rendered the marriage quite impossible.—De la Condamine was about to leave New Orleans for a short time; but, notwithstanding his disappointment, he would not go without a farewell visit to Claudine, and he was even now upon his way to Mr. Pierrepoint's house. He was ushered into the drawing-room, where the fragments of his little fable, scattered upon the floor, instantly attracted his attention; while, through the open window, he heard the lady of his love amusing a circle of giddy companions at his expense. And as the laughter of these heedless beings grated upon his ear, Claudine, apprised that a stranger was within, entered the room.—She saw instantly that he was vexed and angry; and believing the indignity with which she had treated his effusion, to be the cause of his displeasure, endeavored to soften his annoyance by affecting ignorance of the author. Philip made no reply, but fixed his eyes on hers, and, with a withering look of scorn and detestation, left the room. Claudine was very much distressed; under her proud and haughty bearing there lurked a woman's timid heart, and from that hour she feared Philip de la Condamine as much or more than she believed he hated her.

Two years passed on, and all was changed in Claudine Pierrepoint's lot. Her father died—died, too, insolvent—and she became a beggar and a slave! For her maternal ancestors belonged to that degraded race; and though no traces of her dark origin shadowed her lofty brow, or dimmed the rose that blushed upon her cheek, although till now the hideous circumstances had not even been suspected by the poor wretch whose fate hung all upon it—yet was it true. No act of manumission had been passed—she was a slave, and claimed as such by the unfeeling creditors.—She was a slave; nothing might save her from her fearful destiny; expostulation, entreaty, even gold was tried: for a half-brother of her father's, who chanced, at the period of his decease, to be upon the spot, deeply interested in the unprotected orphan, used every means to save her. It was in vain. Her beauty had enhanced her value; all he could offer would not meet the price the heartless wretches set upon her; and she, who had been so delicately reared—the beautiful, the pure, the lofty-minded Claudine—stood shrinking from the public gaze, a jest, a sport, the victim of cupidity, of viler passions still. Once only she raised her tearful eyes—once she was seen to shudder, and then, befriended by her sex's weakness, fell on the ground insensible. In that state she was purchased at an enormous price; in that state she was carried to her master's dwelling; and when returning consciousness brought all the horror of her situation to her mind; she was in a strange room, with unfamiliar faces around her. Nor dared she ask whose it was, or whose the menials so intent on her recovery, lest she should hear the name she dreaded most on earth.

"Leave me!" she cried to the negress who seemed most active, "leave me! Oh! let me be alone. I want no food, no attendance, I only want to die. I thought I was dead: why, why did you recall me to this miserable world? Leave me, I say."

The slaves obeyed; and the wretched creature, starting from the sofa on which she had been lying, quickly approached a table where some refreshments had been placed, and, seizing a knife, for a moment meditated self-destruction. But the instinctive love of life, the fear of offending her almighty Maker, delayed her frantic purpose; and while she stood irresolute, the sound of a shuffling footstep caught her ear, and her whole frame shook with horror; she knew her most appalling fears were realised. De la Condamine had purchased her—De la Condamine now stood beside her. For a few seconds neither spoke; at length he broke the painful silence.

"We are both changed, much changed, Claudine, since the morning when my folly called forth your merriment; when, after having spurned my love, you derided my infirmities, and made a mockery of that which should have called forth pity and compassion. Claudine, do you still recollect that day?"

Claudine bent her head forward, and the long tresses fell in rich clusters on her pallid cheeks.—"I do remember it," she said; "I have, I fear, but too much cause; but for my foolish conduct on that fatal morning, perhaps I had not been as I am now—your slave!"

"Not so, not so, Claudine, you are no slave.—You are free, free as the mountain rivulet. It is true, the wealth I once presumed to offer you, the gold I valued most, because I looked upon it as the means of gratifying you, has saved you from an ignominious fate; yet you are no slave, I have bought your freedom."

"Freedom!" almost shrieked Claudine.

"Yes, you are free."

"Bless you! O bless you!"

He waved his hand impatiently. "Your kinsman left New Orleans this morning, for he could not bear to witness your unhappiness; but I have dispatched a messenger to tell him you are here, and beg his immediate return. This evening, or to morrow at the latest, I expect him, and you will leave this place together."

"Bless you! O bless you!" Claudine once more exclaimed, as throwing herself upon her knees, she seized his hand, and pressed it to her beating heart. For a moment Philip looked towards her, then raised her gently, placed her upon a seat, and silently withdrew.

Mr. William Pierrepoint was an English merchant of very moderate fortune, residing in the neighborhood of London; thither, after some little delay, he brought his adopted charge, and bade his wife and daughters look upon her as a child and sister. The injunction was unnecessary; they were kind, simple-minded people, who saw nothing in their new relative but what was dear and lovely; and she was speedily domesticated in the family. Claudine was sensibly alive to all their kindness, and in return strove to be cheerful, to appear happy; but it might not be—her thoughts were ever in her own far country, and the remembrance of the degradation she had suffered pressed like a heavy weight upon her heart. There were others beside her family who loved Claudine, for she was beautiful; her long dark eye-lashes, so soft and pensive, her graceful mien, her exquisitely moulded form, raised her above the herd of merely pretty women: and, all impoverished as she was, there were not wanting those who gladly would have linked their fate with hers—but one had left his image on her heart, and it seemed sacrilege even to entertain a thought of love or preference save for him.

Years passed away—Claudine's beauty faded, faded before its time. Beauty, even with us, the flower but of a day, is still more evanescent in the daughters of the western world. Claudine was changed; it mattered not; her loveliness had been but a pernicious gift, and its departure caused her no regret. It chanced about this time there was a dinner-party—a dull, formal dinner-party. The ladies, seated in a circle, looked wearied, made insignificant remarks, and twirled their fans. The gentlemen stood about the room in knots of two or three, and talked of the funds and politics.—The owner of the house was in a sort of grave fidget, (if my readers can comprehend such a state) the lady, in the midst of her endeavors to amuse her guests, looked anxiously in the direction of the door, and not very complacently towards her husband, for she knew the dinner was being spoilt, and the person who caused the inconvenient delay had been invited espicially by him.

At length her patience being fairly exhausted dinner was ordered, to the infinite relief of the assembled party: the guests took their places at the table, the soup was handed round, and something like a thaw began. Just then a carriage drove up to the door, a shabby knock was given, an awkward looking person shuffled into the room, muttered in a low husky voice some faint excuse for his late appearance, then sank into the vacant seat, and, without looking round, applied himself to the half-cold soup that was set before him.—Mrs. Barton the owner of the house, gave the poor man a stiff reproving bow, while the majority of the company paused in their eating, or their talking, to speculate from whence had sprung so strange a looking being. But there was present one person whose cheek glowed, whose heart beat, and hand trembled; Claudine Pierrepoint was among the guests, and in that uncouth stranger recognised Philip De la Condamine. She found no opportunity of speaking, or even bowing to him, for they were seated on the same side of the table, and it was impossible to catch his eye. As, however, the ladies left the room, she ventured an inclination of her head. It was barely answered; in fact, he doubted whether the salutation had been meant for him. Claudine felt she was forgotten, and her father's warning rushed upon her mind.

The evening glided on: the gentlemen came up from the dining room: there was music, flirting, conversation—but De la Condamine, a stranger and neglected, stood alone. Claudine mustered all her courage, and addressing him by name, proffered her hand. He started.

"You do not recollect me," she said coloring, I am so changed and altered. Philip de la Condamine forgets Claudine Pierrepoint."

Philip looked earnestly at the agitated Claudine, then said (he was no courtier he never had been one) something of "time," something about the lapse of years "

That night in the dark stillness of her chamber Claudine wept—wept for the beauty she had lost; Philip had loved that beauty, now it was gone, and with it all her chance of pleasing him.—Claudine was wrong; there yet remained something superior to her vanished charms—the spirit's loveliness was there and soon did Philip own its power. They met again. Mr. Pierrepoint, anxious to testify his sense of gratitude towards the man who had acted thus noble a part, gave him an invitation to his house; and thrown once more into Claudine's society; all the affection with which De la Condamine had formerly regarded her, revived; and ere long it was generally known an engagement had taken place. He returned to New Orleans to make some arrangements rendered necessary by his future plans; for as Claudine's re-appearance in that city was deemed impossible, it was settled he should be received as a junior partner in his uncle's house, and about six months after Mrs. Barton's dinner party, he and Claudine were married.

"And were happy ever after."

Not altogether, gentle reader! There were at first drawbacks to their felicity: Philip's fortune had already suffered from the enormous sum he paid for Claudine's freedom; transfers of property are seldom unaccompanied by loss—his was peculiarly unfortunate; for many years, therefore it required much toil on his part, and economy on hers, to enable them to live at all. Claudine thought nothing of her own privations, but it pained her sensibly to see him overworked and anxious, and self-reproach was busy when she reflected, as she hourly did, that it was from love to her these trials and anxieties had arisen.

"Philip," she said one day, when he appeared unusually harrassed, "my own Philip, you have bought my happiness at too high a price."

"I do no think so," he replied.

"Oh, if you knew how bitterly I lament my blindness, my folly, my worse than folly!"

"Pooh, pooh! who could expect a beautiful girl of seventeen to fall in love with such an ugly dog as I am. I was the fool for even thinking of it."

I believe it is hardly necessary to inform the reader that the groundwork of this little tale is true. The disgraceful scene, in which Claudine bore so conspicuous and disgraceful a part, has been enacted—may be repeated, with, I fear, but little chance of a chivalrous Philip de la Condamine to interpose between the victim of an iniquitous system and her dark destiny.

President Buchez.

From the Phil. North American.

Literary men have often been disposed to regard the Chinese—"celestigal" innocents of the Flowery Land though they be—as the most civilized people in the world, because letters are there made the measure of merit and the fountain of honor, the best educated men being those whom the State advances to the highest public dignities. France begins to dispute—perhaps she has already won—the palm of superior civilization; in no other country is intellectual cultivation, of any and every kind, so sure of that solid appreciation which leads to its employment in public affairs. In America—priding ourselves too much upon our utilitarian character, or taking the fashion too much from aristocratic England, where genius is worshipped in the tomb, after being despised in the garret—we are too apt to regard men of science and letters as fancy men, unfit for the business responsibilities of life; and no towering author-craft, save that of the political writer, and no professional eminence, out of the profession of law, as a general rule, suggest to us the existence of a talent which might be safely entrusted with a function of government. France, however, has found that such fancy men make, after all, very good public men. She has discovered in a poet—Lamartine—one of the truest patriots and ablest statesmen of the age; and in an astronomer—Arago—whose eyes and thoughts have been so long rambling among the stars—a great mind capable of descending from the contemplation of the harmonies of a universe to the regulation of armies, navies and colonies. But what is still more surprising—or what will prove, at least, highly agreeable to the members of the most philanthropic of professions, and, therefore, especially so to many of our readers in Philadelphia, the "city of schools"—she has discovered, and proved, that the medical world is as full as any other professional world of the commanding talents fit to hold the helm of State. M. Buchez, the President of the National Assembly of France, elected by the highest vote of his colleagues in that vast assemblage of nine hundred men, the first spirits of France, is a PHYSICIAN; and his competitors for that high chair, MM. Iretat and Recourt (one of whom received 234, the other 91 votes,) are also physicians!

We find in the last received number of the London Lancet (for May 18th,) a biographical sketch of M. Buchez, chiefly translated from a French periodical, L'Union Medicale; from which we make a few extracts, sufficient to depict his excellent character, and what the Lancet calls "his extraordinary career"—for Buchez is, like most of our American master-spirits, a self-made man.

"M. Buchez belongs to an humble family of agriculturists, in the department of Ardennes, and was brought up at Paris under the immediate care of his father, who held the situation of collector of the 'octroi' duty. His medical studies were of a distinguished and sound character; some of his teachers, who are still alive, remember it well; and among his fellow students he secured many friends, who, now in practice in Paris, have loudly testified their devotion and attachment to him. M. Buchez has been, for the last thirty years, what some people are now laboring to appear. He founded, in 1822, the Carbonary Association, as mentioned by Louis Blanc, in his "Histoire de Dix Ans." The following year he was arrested on suspicion of being concerned tn the Beford conspiracy, and narrowly escaped capital punishment, since his acquittal was pronounced by only one half of the jurymen.—After these events, M. Buchez gave up political agitation, and became the disciple of St. Simon, in order to carry out social reforms. He became the editor of several Socialist periodicals, and advocated some of his doctrines in a medical paper, which he established in 1827, under the name of Journal des Progres des Sciences et Institutions Medicales, as also in a work called Traite d'Hygiene Populaire, which he published with Dr. Iretat, who was lately his competitor for the Presidency. M. Buchez, after St. Simon's death, refused to adopt Pantheism, as being contrary to the progress of the human species, (the writer might have added for a better reason, following.) He remained attached to Christianity, and advocated, of the new school, those ideas only which related to the improvement of the human species, and combined these with a vast system of Christain philosophy."

"M. Buchez yielded, with great reluctance, to the solicitations of the Mayor of Paris to become his deputy, and was inclined, after the conflict, to return to his literary labors; but he was at last prevailed upon to accept the office. He is more of a practical man that Louis Blanc; for he had, long ago, organized associations of workmen, who have ever since prosperously carried on extensive manufactures on their own beneficial account.—He has displayed, in office, for the last two months, an activity which is well calculated to astonish those who think that a man who indulges much in general conception, is unfit for practical life. It should not be omitted, that M. Buchez, who attended with as much zeal to his professional duties as to his literary pursuits, has constantly resided in "a little room under the leads," has ever been extremely abstemious, and has preserved all the simple and unassuming habits of an unpretending agriculturist."

To an English—or American—critic, M. Buchez would appear quite too much a fancy man for public life, being a physician, an author, and even a Socialist. But M. Buchez is, and ever has been, a Christian: that preserved him from the perils and absurdities of all the modern French philosophies, from which he has extracted the good and rejected the bad. What was really practicable in social reform, he has advocated and helped to establish, to the benefit of the working man. His philosophy has never aimed to be any thing wiser or better than a "Christian philosophy;" and, therefore, it has been a true and successful philosophy. Such philosophy is the best preparation for public life; and the wisdom of the author and the philanthropy of the physician have proved to be neither obstacles nor disqualifications. The elevation of M. Buchez is an honor to France and to a noble profession.

THE EMU IN HIS NATIVE FORESTS.—A native, who was walking at my side, and who had accompanied us all day, stopped suddenly and pointing with his finger, said, "Emu!" About a mile distant across the prairie were two of those birds quietly feeding. The dogs were immediately called together, fresh vigor seemed to animate the whole party, and we proceeded to give chase, in high spirits. Emus are sometimes shot with the rifle, but the usual mode of obtaining them is by hunting them with Kangaroo dogs. If you happen to come near enough to them without raising alarm, they may frequently be detained, and even attracted almost up to your stirrups, by whistling.—I have known this to be repeatedly tried with success. When you begin to whistle, the emu lifts up its head and listens with attention; soon, delighted with the sound, he walks leisurely in the direction from whence it comes; then, perceiving a human being, he pauses, seems irresolute, and finally walks round and round you in circles, gradually lessening, until he approaches within a few yards. If his confidence be not repaid with a bullet, he will, after gratifying his curiosity by a good stare, quietly walk away through his native woods. Emus are frequently speared by the natives, who, by taking care to stand stock-still the moment the creature lifts up its head, manage to approach within a few yards of them while feeding. Tho' the savage may have his hand raised in the act of throwing the spear he remains fixed in that attitude whilst the emu takes a survey of him. Perceiving only an object without motion, the bird takes him for a tree, and continues to graze, falling a victim, like other innocent things, to a misplaced confidence in its own security. The headmost dog caught hold of the extended flapper of one of these birds, and arrested its progress; the others, coming up, soon pulled him to the ground, and by the time we reached the spot he was dead. The feathers from the tail were distributed among the party, and placed in our caps; and the legs, being cut off, the rest of the bird was abandoned. The legs alone afford any meat, which is by no means a delicacy, and resembles coarse beef.—The Bushman.

Prince Albert's Address before the Society for the Improvement of the Laboring Classes.

This society held its fourth annual meeting in London on the 18th of May. An immense assemblage took place, made up of the nobility and aristocracy of the country. His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided, and on taking the chair called on the Bishop of London to offer prayers; after which Prince Albert rose, and was received with loud cheers. When they had subsided, he said· Ladies and gentlemen, when, four years since, this Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Laboring Classes was first established on its present footing, I accepted with pleasure the offer made me of becoming its president. [Loud cheers.] I saw in this offer a proof of the appreciation the society entertained of my feelings, my sympathy and my interest for that class of our community which has most of the toil and least of the enjoyments of the world. [Hear, hear, and cheers]. I conceived that great advantage would accrue to it from the endeavors of influential people, who were wholly disinterested to act the part of friends to those who required assistance, which only a friend could tender with advantage. [Hear, hear, and cheers]. This society has always held this object before its eyes, and has ever been laboring in that direction. You are all aware that it was estabilised to erect model lodging-houses. loan funds, and the allotment of of land in different parts of the country; but it has been careful only to establish examples and models, mindful that any real improvement which was to take place must be the result of the exertions of the working people themselves. I have just come from the model lodging-house, the opening of which we celebrate this day—[cheers]—and I feel convinced that its existence will, by degrees, lead to the erection of others, and that it will lead to a complete change in the domestic comforts of the working classes, [cheers] as it will exhibit to them that with real economy can be combined advantages and comforts to which they have hitherto been strangers, while it will at the same time show those who possess capital, which they are desirous to invest, that they may do so in connection with this institution with great advantage and profit to themselves, dispensing at the same those comforts which I have enumerated to their poorer brethren. Depend upon it, it is for the advantage of those classes who are so often contrasted, but whose interests are identical, to unite, and it is only ignorance which prevents them uniting for each others benefit. To dispel that ignorance, and to show the means how man can help man, notwithstanding the complications of civilized society, ought to be the aim of every philanthropic person. [Hear.] But it is most peculiarly the duty of those, who, under the blessings of Divine Providence, enjoy station, wealth, and education. [Cheers.] Let them be careful how to avoid any dictatorial interference with labor and employment, which frightens away capital, destroys that freedom of thought and independence of action which must remain to every one if he is to work out his own happiness—[loud cheers]—and to repose that confidence in each other on which alone the enjoyment and mutual benefit of mankind rests. God has created man imperfect, and left him with many wants, as it were to stimulate each individual to exertion, and to make them all feel that it is only by united exertions and combined action that those imperfections can be supplied, and these wants satisfied—self-reliance and confidence in each other. It is to show the way how these individual exertions can be directed to the greatest benefit, and to foster that confidence upon which the readiness to assist each other depends, that this society considers as its most sacred aim. [Hear.] There has been no ostentatious display of charity or of its manifestations—not a protestation to become the arbiter of the fate of thousands, but to aid the working out of practical schemes of public improvement for which this society, as I said before, has been established; but it has only as yet established examples for the country at large to follow. The report of the society, descriptive of its proceedings the during the past year, will be laid before you.—I must say, I hope I may say, that this society has proceeded satisfactorily toward the accomplishment of its objects, owing to the particularly kind feelings and great endeavors of the indefatigable zeal of Lord Ashley. [Loud cheers.] The next stage that we contemplate is the erection of a model lodging-house for females. [Cheers.] I hope this meeting will enable us to carry out this step, and all engage to do all in their power to call the particular attention of the public to the object we have in view. [His Royal Highness resumed his seat amid loud cheers.]

Princess Beljoioso.—At her first arrival in the French Capital, she took the lead as a beauty—the perfection, as she was, of a glowing young Italian—but her wit and conversational powers soon left her beauty a secondary thing, and even of this pre-eminence, she in a year or two became impatient. With keen and ready industry, she took up science, and before long became the beautiful centre of a circle of men of learning, lastly, even, having written a work on divinity, which added to the respect of superior men for her powers.

The princess was lately called upon by a scientific gentleman. On entering her drawing-room, he observed a young officer, and did not immediately recognize his fair friend under the disguise of the uniform. Her hair had been cropped short, and curled close to her head a la Titus. Her military frock was buttoned over her well rounded chest to the throat. The stripe down the pantaloons was fitted to the boot with the imperative turn that gives a meaning to the spur, and there was but the one exception, which all women make to the correctness of masculine costume—the cap was cocked too far on one side.

"How am I to explain this new phase of our favorite planet?" said the astronomer, making at the same time the best possible use of his eyes.

"Ah!" replied the Princess, "you did not observe my travelling carriage in the court-yard as you came up?"

"And where bound, in these troubled times?" he asked with wonder.

"To the wars—to the wars!" she exclaimed, striking her heels together with a drill thump that made the apartment ring. "Italy—my country—is at war with the tyrannical Austrian, and I am off in an hour."

"Not famous enough, my dear Princess?" pathetically sighed the astronomer—"beauty, wit, science, theology, have all done their best for you, and still you are athirst for distinction!"

The Princess threw off her dramatic manner and looked grave.

"It is not altogether for a new fame," she said in another tone, "though that goes for something, as it well may—but my country, Italy, is a land worth striking a blow for, even with so poor a hand as this, and I go to raise men with what money I can command, and to lead them if need be."

The princess looked like an enthusiastic young officer of 18, while she spoke, though she is now past thirty—her male dress had so rejuvenated her—and her learned friend describes her expression, tone, and beauty together, as having been memorably attractive.

The account of this morning call has become current since the news from Italy, that, in the late attack of the Sardinian army upon the Austrian, the Princess led 200 men, of her own arming and equipping, and behaved herself most gallantly.—Courrier des Etats Unis.

Lake Superior Mines.

The anticipations of rich results from the operations in copper mining on Lake Superior, seem not to have been realized. The fever of the two past seasons will scarcely return with the present, as sad realities have taken the place of brilliant hopes. The following summary of the copper business during the past winter, which we copy from the Lake Superior News, is sufficiently illustrative of the present position of affairs:

WINTER OPERATIONS, &c.

The Suffolk Company have worked during the winter six miners on a new vein which presented fine prospects at the surface, but is not yet sufficiently proven to determine upon its value. They have erected a furnace for smelting their ore, but for the want of an efficient and qualified smelter, the operation had been suspended. Mr. Pray, the Superintendent has, however, made his arrangements for efficient work during the present season.

The Gratiot Company have had a force only of two men during the winter, engaged upon a vein of gray sulphuret of copper—the value of which has not been proven, as none of the workings have extended in depth more than twenty feet.

The Michigan and La Belle Alliance, two companies, claiming same location, have done as yet but little at mining—the latter nothing, and the former working six men during the winter without any satisfactory prospect.

The Buffalo Company have worked three men during the winter on a vein of greenstone formation, without any results.

The Medora Company found a vein in November last, in the greenstone formation, upon which a shaft was sunk to the depth of 40 feet, from whence they drifted some 30 feet, without its amounting to any thing positive. All are of the opinion, however, that there is a valuable vein in the neighborhood.

The Albion Company's Works, a few rods west of the Medora, were suspended in the spring of 1847—since which time they have had but 3 or 4 men in employment. They have a good vein which might be worked to profit.

The Forsyth Company have done but little during the winter, having but two men on their location.

The Quincy Company, near Portage Lake, have had but a small force during the winter, but enough has been discovered to establish the fact that one of their two veins may be considered as valuable as any in the country, according to the work done upon it. They only want an efficient force and energetic work to realize.

To complete our brief notices of the locations on Point Keewenaw, we should add that the following Companies have not been engaged during the winter, and that some of them were abandoned sometime ago: the Alliance, Massachusetts, Boston, Isle Royale, New York and Michigan, Clinton, Eagle Harbor, Lake Superior, the Superior, Copper Rock, New York and Lake Superior, Houghton, Trap Rock River, and the Eldorado and Pennsylvania.

West of Portage Lake, the Pittsburgh and Portage Lake Company have had a force of 11 men during the winter, whose works have been confined to a prior-formed vein, from which little mineral has yet been taken.

The Algonquin Company have been engaged in erecting a saw mill, furnace, &c., upon their location near the Fire Steel River, under the direction of Col. Cushman.

The Douglass Houghton Company have four men upon their tract near the Algonquin, working upon a vein of prior formation; and there are some locations held by squatters in this vicinity, who have during the winter been working upon similar veins.

On the Ontonagon, Col. Cushman has completed his smelting works, mills and buildings, but got out but little ore.

The Ontonagon Company, better known as Location 98, have made returns of native copper and silver, and also copper in the rock, and are advancing with good success.

The Ohio Trap Rock and Silver Company are making good turn outs.

The Boston and Lake Superior Company are also getting out copper under favorable circumstances.

The Union Company of New York have a force engaged on a vein 6 feet 6 inches in width, carrying metallic copper in about 4 feet, and on which they have sunk a shaft 112 feet in depth. The Company intend to erect, during the season, a simple stamping and washing apparatus, from which they anticipate a speedy remuneration for their outlay.

Most of the other Companies were obliged to abandon operations for the winter in consequence of failure to receive their supplies.

THE BOND OF THE HOUSE.—The English term "husband" is derived from the Anglo Saxon word hus and band, which signify the "bond of the house;" and it was anciently spelt "house-bond" and continued to be spelt thus in some editions of the English Bible, after the introduction of the art of printing. A husband, then, is a house-bond—the bond of a house—that which engirdles the family into the union of oneness of love. Wife, and children. and "stranger within the gates"—all their interests and their happiness are encircled in the "house-bond's" embrace, the objects of his protection, and his especial care. What a fine picture this is of a husband's duty, and a family's privileges?

Love and Law!

"I never had a piece of bread,
Particularly fine and wide,
But it fell on the sanded floor;
And always on the butter'd side."

A case was tried before A. Cowdin, Esq., on Saturday last, which, for its novelty, attracted considerable attention, and went far to prove the instability of earthly hopes. From what we can learn of the affair, it appears that a young man named Henry J. Turner, of Alexander, a writing-master, daguerretypist, &c., becoming, some time since, deeply enamoured of Miss N., a worthy and respectable young lady of that town, proceeded to inflict upon her his particular attentions, and by way of enhaucing her esteem of his own dear self, made her various trifling presents. When the time, which "tries men's souls" arrived, he marched boldly to the task, but soon retreated, with as much disorder and chagrin as did the Mexicans after receiving the fire from Captain Bragg's battery. To all appearances, all his devotedness and trouble had been for naught—the hopes he had so fondly cherished—the bright anticipations of happiness which had so far cheered in his "single blessedness," and the plans which he had formed, proved to be mere "castles built of air." But he yielded not yet. He retreated, but it was to gather new strength to renew the contest. Altering his tactics, he wrote the lady several letters, (which were read in court,) declaring himself her true and tried lover, but that she must accept of him or war would be the result—that delays were dangerous; and advising her to choose that good part which could not be taken from her, (meaning himself, we suppose,) and he would overlook the past, if not, she must drink the bitter cup to its dregs—he must be remunerated—he would let the finger of public scorn be pointed 'till the tallest angel, with one foot upon the sea and the other upon the land, should proclaim that time shall be no more,' and concluded by saying that tears so blinded his eyes he could not write further, &c.

In the enumeration of articles charged her, were, a thimble, knitting needles, use of watch, one or two rides, a daguereotype, in which his own phiz was prominent, a couple of pictures, one yard cotton cloth, candy, pills, and various other equally trifling arricles. He brought suit to recover for gifts, and services. The Jury returned "no cause of action."

Human nature is a queer compound. We thought of moralizing a little upon the waywardness and inconsistency of erring mortals, how man had fallen from his high estate, and subverted the ends for which he was created to gratify his own selfish desires, &c., but our limits will not permit. Taking the case altogether, it was one of the most ridiculous yet amusing incidents which has fallen under our observation for many a day. —Batavia Advocate.

ARRIVAL OF MADEMOISELLE LIND.—Mademoiselle Lind arrived on the 24th at Blackwall, from Hamburg, by the Countess of Lansdale steamer. The Swedish papers say that her departure from Stockholm was attended by the most extraordinary demonstration. It was on the 13th; the weather was beautiful, from 15,000 to 20,000 people lined the quays, military bands were placed at intervals, and she embarked amid cheers and music. The rigging of the vessels in the harbor was manned. The hurrahs and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs continued as long as the vessel which bore Jenny Lind remained in sight. Her last performance at Stockholm was for the benefit of a charitable institution she had founded.—N. Y. Sun.

THE FORESTS OF OREGON.—It is more especially in the forest that the grand, the picturesque, the sublime, the beautiful, form the most singular and fantastic combinations. From the loftiest giants of the forest down to the humblest shrubs, all excite the spectator's astonishment. The parasites form a characteristic feature of these woodlands. They cling to the tree, climb it to a certain height, and then, letting their tops fall to the earth, again take root—again shoot up—push from branch to branch—from tree to tree, in every direction—until tangled, twisted, and knotted every possible form, they festoon the whole forest with drapery, in which a groundwork of the richest verdure is diversified with garlands of the most varied and many colored flowers. In ascending the Columbia, we meet, from time to time, with bays of considerable extent, interspersed with handsome little islands, which, thrown, as it were, like groups of flowers and verdure, present a charming spectacle. Here the painter should go to study his art—here would he find the loveliest scenery, the most varied and brilliant coloring. At every step the scene becomes more ravishing, the perspective more noble and majestic. In no other part of the world is nature so great a coquette as here.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.—"Whta will be the effect on the Catholic religion of separating Church and State, and making the Pope only the chief Bishop of Rome?" This is a question which many ask their neighbors and many more ask themselves—but it is one of difficult solution. Originally, the Popes were only Bishops of Rome, their powers were wholly ecclesiastical, and they had no territorial influence. Then there were but few Catholics in the world; now, there are many millions; then, nearly all Christians were Catholics, now they are divided into many sects. We cannot perceive how the Church is to be injured by incorporating the Papal States with the rest of the States in Italy, and confining the Pope or the Bishop of Rome to his ecclesiastical duties. Indeed, we think it would be beneficial to the Church. He could dispense with the College of Cardinals, and assign each Cardinal to certain ecclesiastical duties. St. Peter's and the Vatican would still belong to the See of Rome, and the Pope divested of his temporal and perplexing power, would be more strengthened in the discharge of his religious duties, and would more securely direct the affairs of the Church, in Rome and other parts of the world. We can see no good cause, therefore, to apprehend any injury from the change. The separation of Church and State is one of the leading ideas of the revolution in Europe, and if it has prevailed at Rome, it has only preceded a similar event in England, where the liberals have declared in favor of the separation of the Protestant Church from the Government.—N. Y. Star.

VENICE AND THE UNITED STATES.—The Provisional Government of Venice have put forth an address to the people of the United States, through our Consul, Mr. Sparks, in which they say!—

"The ocean divides us, but we are united by the bonds of sympathy; and liberty, like the electric current traversing the seas, will bring us your examples, and maintain the communion of thought and feeling, which is far more precious than that of interest. We have much to learn from you, and, though your elders in civilization, we blush to acknowledge it. We have no other ambition than to live in the enjoyment of peace and liberty, to recover the heritage of our ancestors, and to contribute, in some degree, by our efforts, also to the infinite developement of the human mind."

PREPARE FOR A REVERSE.—No one knows how soon his lot may be reversed. In its unceasing revolutions, the wheel of fortune may in one day place him among the poor. How many at this moment are languishing in all the horrors of the most abject destitution, who were once rich in this world's goods, and on whose lips dwelt in perpetual sweetness the self-deluding promise, "tomorrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant!" Remember the poor! In yonder gloomy prison lies one who made gold his idol.—He forgot the needy in his distress; and the appeals of the wretched woke no echo in his heart. He was not his "brother's keeper," so he hoarded up his surplus lucre in his coffers, and permitted the dying and the destitute to meet their doom; but as he meted out to them, even so it has been meted unto him. Not a ray of affection cheers now his prison walls. Left alone with the phantoms of the past, how agonizing is his remorse.—Remember the poor, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, minister to the distressed, and their prayers and blessings will fall upon your head like rich incense, more desirable than gold or jewels.

A MEXICAN IDOL!—An officer of the Navy has sent to the Mayor of New Orleans a bona fide Idol from the Capital of the Aztec, of great antiquity and most venerable appearance, though not the most fascinating. The N. O. Cresent thus describes this "strange god:"

"Imagine a block of coarse granite, four feet in lengh and two in breath, carved into some resemblance of the human form. The form is said to represent that some ancient Mexican maiden who was sacrificed to the Sun. The feet are very chubby, and the hands are clasped around the body as though the image was in pain. In common decency to truth, we cannot say that we admired the beauty of the countenance of this feminine idol, for the rains, snows and storms of perhaps a thousand years had entirely destroyed the eyes, snubbed the nose, and even taken off its finger nails.

GALVANIC SPECTACLES.—Mr. J. S. Paine, optician, of Worcester, Mass., has invented something new in the way of spectacles. He has constructed that part of the bows holding the glasses, and the bridge, of two metals, viz.: silver and zinc—and he is confident of having thus achieved an important improvement by an uninterrupted flow of electricity, which he believes invigorates the eyes and actually relieves them from a world of small physical annoyances, independently of wanting vision. By touching the tip of the tongue on the nose piece, an unmistakable sensation is produced, and a flash of light is instantly perceptible. Mr. Paine thinks that he feels a cool current constantly passing by the orbits, while the glasses are worn. Like a genuine Yankee, he secures a patent, of course: and if the discovery equals his expectations, the millions of spectacle wearers of all countries will soon begin to pay tribute to New England ingenuity. The subject is one that should command the attention of physicians, since a new province for exploration is exposed to view.—Medical and Surgical Jour.

GUTTA PERCHA NEWSPAPER.—We believe that the Mirror was the first paper on this side the Atlantic to call attention to the new universally known substance called the Gutta Percha. To-day we print a part of our edition on Gutta Percha—doubtless the first newspaper in this or any other country that has been printed on this kind of paper. The curious may see a specimen by calling at our office, for we cannot send a sheet to all our patrons.—N. Y. Mirror.

Birth-Day Sonnet.

Mine surely seems a sombre-shaded lot,
Drear, dark, and dismal—scarce a single ray
Of joy illumes the mist that clouds the way
Which I must take. To live unknown—forgot—
Seemeth my destiny:—yet I will not Yield my soul quietly to be the prey
Of doubt—of disappointment, and dismay,
Which fain would quell each high and noble thought.
I will be free!—will break the galling chain
That binds my soul to earth and seek true peace.
Oh God! in mercy, not in wrath, restrain
My erring heart, and bid the conflict cease:
Let Thy WILL be my LAW. Then I, content,
Shall see and own Thy hand in each event.

The Ballot Box.

On an election day in the State of New Hampshire, what significance is there in the act of putting a piece of printed paper into a wooden box? Very great. The voter declares in the most emphatic and effective way, to the people of the whole State that he protests henceforth and forever against the injustice of that provision of the Constitution of New Hampshire which excludes her Roman Catholic citizens from offices of public trust, and that he nominates two men good and true, as delegates to the Legislature of his State, who shall give utterance to his protest, and do their utmost to procure a revision of the Constitution, and to have it purged of its inhumanity.

The citizens of Ohio inspired by the "new commandment" that sums all religion and all duty, hurries to the polls, and declares that his soul abhors the war his Government wage against a sister Republic—that it must cease—that its aiders and abettors shall be flung out of office, and that administrative, and legislative trusts will not be committed by the people of Ohio to the hands of men stained, in imagination, if not in fact, with the blood of agressive warfare.

A Cornish man comes up from the galleries of a Wisconsin mine, to vote for delegates to a Convention to frame a Constitution for his future State. Familiar from his youth with the evils of land monopoly under the British Crown—the victim of an unwilling exile from the land of his birth, compelled upon him by the Game Laws and the Law of Primogeniture, which sustained like pillars the baronial manor in whose deep pits he lived and toiled, he demands at the polls the insertion of a provision in the organic law of Wisconsin, that shall repel speculation and capital from the public lands—that shall prevent the monopoly of agricultural soil in any quantity greater than is actually required for the support of a family—and that the door of the public domain be always held open for entrance and occupation to the landless poor. At his side is the father of a married woman, whose husband has wasted her property and broken her heart. He has lost his all at the gaming table—his estate—his virtues—and his hopes. To satisfy his sense of justice and his benevolence, stung into activity by the injury inflicted upon his child through the imperfections of the law, the old man pleads at the polls, the cause of the future matrons of his State, and insists, by his ballot, upon a constitutional provision giving to every married woman the control of the property she may have at the time of marriage, or may thereafter acquire—and protecting it effectually from the thriftlessness, the folly—or the vice of her husband.

The Elector of New York writes upon a slip of paper the names of the citizens best adapted in his opinion to fill the administrative offices of the State—and its ministers of public justice, and its guardians of public rights,—the managers of the public works—the keepers and disbursers of its public treasure, and the administrators of its public prisons receive their appointments from his ballot.—He wishes to have the industry of the nation stimulated by protecting it from unequal competition with foreign labor, and votes for a Representative to Congress who is favorable to a protective Tariff. Or he believes that all restriction upon the international exchange of commodities should be taken off—he makes his profession at the ballot-box, and by his vote delegates a Free Trader to represent his principles in the National Legislature.

An inland navigation of thousands of miles traversing state after state, and bearing upon its bosom untold wealth of the products of Nature and of Art, is rendered unsafe for want of harbors of refuge, and expensive from obstructions. The merchants, the shippers, the farmers, and the travellers of each of the States most interested in the improvement of this world-important thoroughfare, declare at the polls, that a part of the National treasure shall be applied to that purpose, and from the polls they send accredited agents to Washington to vote the needed money.

It is the ballot only that utters the voice of Justice, demanding an equality of political rights among all the citizens of a State, and that that the accident of a complexion shall not be punished with civil disabilities and social contempt.

LAW ACCORDING TO PUNCH.—We have it on excellent authority, that if A. owes B. money, and A. is owner of an elephant, B. may detain the elephant's trunk till the debt is paid; and it is also tolerably clear in all the books, that a boa constrictor lying dormant, as if dead in a deal box, is recoverable by an action on the case; but if the plaintif mixes himself up with the boa constrictor, so as to identify himself with it, he, the plaintif, will not be recoverable at all. If the boa constrictor should unfold his tail early enough, the plaintif may have a severance; but, otherwise, says Mr. Justice Maule, he must inevitably be quashed.

Much of the noise which the rumbling of vehicles occasions, and which is so annoying with open doors in summer, might be prevented by using "wash leathers" to prent the grating of metal upon metal. A utilitarian friend thinks the general adoption of this simple remedy would be productive of much comfort to our citizens, and it is certainly worth the trial.

A Chariot Race.

We copy the following description of a chariot race at the Olympic Games, from a powerfully written story in the June number of Peterson's Magazine.

Now had come the exciting moment—the grand finale of the exercises. The crowd pressed around more densely as the heralds proclaimed that the race of Alcibiades, the Syracusan, and Synisca would now be contested. Anxiety was deeply pictured in every face. In casting lots for their stations fate was again opposed to the Athenian—for he was now thrown on the extreme right, the Syracusan having obtained the left, while Synisca of course occupied the centre.

Four coal black steeds, remarkable for immense muscular development, answered to the rein of Alcibiades. His chariot was also of ponderous size, and glittered with massive rich gildings—One would have supposed that the weight of the vehicle would necessarily impede its celerity—though none questioned the sagacity of the Athenian, yet many wondered. Nothing more splendid of better appointed had ever been seen upon the hippodrome than this equippage. Those of Synisca and Calimachus were indeed remarkably beautiful and symmetrical—but no comparison was instituted against the Athenian's, for who could cope with the far-famed Alcibiades!

The signal was given and again the charioteers whirled of in the exciting race. The contestants were apparently quite evenly matched, for after the first round, as the vehicles passed the throne of the judges, no discernible advantages had been gained by either. It was observed, however, that the Athenian having the extreme right end had gradually approached the centre, throwing the fair Spartan much nearer to Calimachus.

"By Jove," said a stout Athenian, "I had strange thoughts from the first to the motives which influenced the choice of those clumsy, overgrown horses and that huge car."

"Be sure that movement bodes danger to one of them," said his companion. Alcibiades is not wont to make a mischoice—but Heavens, look now!"

This last remark had been elicited by a glance hastily thrown at the chariots, which now had assumed a most perilous and thrilling attitude. The wily Athenian that thought that speed was not alone to be relied on in a contest of the character which he was now engaged in—and his fertile mind had fallen upon an expedient at once sagacious and fearful. The chariots, in passing the first round, had been forced more closely to each other, and from the direction of the Athenian's eye and his evident aim, it was seen that they must come together at or near the boundary point, and produce by a concussion the most imminent danger to the parties. The plan of Alcibiades, and the objects of his selection, were now penetrated, and the judges and privileged spectators rose to their feet breathless with anxiety, for all foresaw the inevitable and fatal result should the plan be heartlessly pursued.

The antagonists approached the critical point; a shudder thrilled through every besom as the ponderous chariot was seen still pressing to the others. The beautiful and intrepid Spartan madly urged her spirited steeds to avoid the threatened danger and obtain the lead. Her long, luxuriant hair floated wildly in the breeze raised by the speed of her career; and her fine voice was heard encouraging the Syracusan to maintain his speed and position, that the boundary might be safely passed. But she had made her discovery too late—the black coursers were too near upon them—and now an adroit movement of Alcibiades threw her chariot full against that of Calimachus, and his own interlocked with them. A ghastly pallor had overspread the features of the Spartan girl, whilst the wild looks of the frightened Syracusan betokened his sense of the danger.

They were now opposite the column—the black coursers were suddenly and violently reined inward, and a crash grated on the ear.

The terrible shock was too much for the slender and elegant vehicles of his antagonists, but that of Alcibiades was unhurt. The terrified Calimachus leaped forward, but in the attempt to sheer one danger he rashly plunged into another. He missed his aim and fell—his feet became entangled in the trappings of the horses, and in an instant he was trampled and mangled to death.

The most lively anxiety was now felt on all sides for the fate of the heroic Synisca, who could be seen still standing on a fragment of her chariot, but whose horses, yet more hampered and pressed by the artful manœuvres of the Athenian, were rearing and plunging in the endeavor to extricate themselves. Two of them had been frightfully wounded in the confusion, and were utterly intractable.

And now the black steeds, almost unmanageable themselves, seemed to be charging full against them: the fragment of the carriage was crushed against the column, and the wounded horses fell under the pressure. Just then, when all were looking with intense and appalling horror to see the Spartan sink before the dread fate which menaced her, Alcibiades was seen to stoop, and quick as lighting he grasped with his left had the waist of the beautiful woman, and held her safely before the astonished crowd, whilst his huge coursers thundered forward to the goal, closely pursued by the remaining horses of Synisca.

First Female Member of the A. A. A. S.—Miss Maria Mitchell, of Nantucket, discoverer of the Comet which bears her name, was unanimously elected an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, at their last general meeting. We believe that this is the first time such an honor has been conferred on any lady in this country; and a similar honor has been conferred on but two ladies in Europe. Miss Caroline Herschel, the sister and assistant of the late Sir William Herschel, in his astronomical labors, and Mrs. Somerville, the commentator on La Place, were some years ago elected honorary members of the Astronomical Society of London. —Boston Traveler.

The Census.—We find in the Telegraph the official census from the several counties of Texas generally, down to the beginning of the present year. The total results for the whole country are as follows: Electors or voters 22,013; white males under 18 years 27,814, white males over 18 and under 45 years 25,149; white males over 45 years 4,899; white females 45,099; slaves 38,753; free colored persons 295. Total white population 102,961. Total white and colored population of all Texas 242,009.

N. B.—No returns are here made from Newton and San Patricio counties, and the returns from several other counties are said to be inaccurate.—Galveston News, May 16.

A little orphan girl, 12 years of age, at Augusta, Ohio, committed to memory in one week, and repeated at Sunday School, 1,010 verses in the New Testament. And what is most remarkable, says the Cincinnati Daily Commercial, that two years ago this little child was brought from Maryland perfectly friendless, and was not acquainted with the alphabet. This is indeed an unprecedented exhibition of the wonderful power of memory.

Gen. Taylor taken Prisoner.

Correspondence of the N. O. Picayune.

IBERVILLE, May 25, 1848.

The good people of Iberville have been in an excitement for some days, created by an expected visit from Gen. Taylor, he having promised to call on some of his numerous friends in that parish and partake of their distinguished hospitality.—Quietly and unheralded, accompanied by D. D. Avery, Esq., he presented himself yesterday at noon, (Tuesday,) at the residence of J. N. Brown, Esq., where he partook of a sumptuous dinner, and then proceeded to the house of a warm personal friend, Col. R. A. Stewart, where he established himself for the day. The General was in remarkably fine spirits, and since he has thrown aside the military dress, and come out in a new suit of black, it seems as if he had turned back the wheels of time and stricken the marks of ten years from his capacious brow. We can form some slight idea by attentively studying his face how it looked when lighted up by the excitement of battle; but yesterday, as he wended his way along, with the broad bosom of the Mississippi on one side, and the luminous fields of cane on the other, we thought that the evidences of peace gave a far more glorious expression to his eye than even the clang of arms and the crash of "glorious war" could. In fact, Gen. Taylor's heart and soul revel in the quiet pursuits of agricultural life; it is passing strange how entirely he puts off his armor when "off duty." In this respect he has no prototype, except in the great man he resembles in so many other points; Washington, the Father of his Country.

It so happened that on the very evening of the arrival of Gen. Taylor at Col. Stewart's, that the beautiful residence of Mr. Simon Le Blanc was lighted up until it seemed to be one blaze of light, and within its precincts was heard the sound of revelry. The patriot's youngest daughter had a few hours before stood at the bridal altar, and hundreds of relatives and admiring friends were gaily and joyously celebrating the event. The rumor went through the crowd that Gen. Taylor had arrived in the neighborhood. The beautiful bride, the troupe of bride's maids, the whole circle of Louisiana's fairest daughters, that graced the festive scene, lisped the honored name, while the gentlemen more boisterously gave vent to their feelings of admiration. In a few moments the ladies formed a plan to "capture the old hero."—They felt confident that they could do what Santa Anna and twenty thousand picked troops could not. Miss ——, Miss ——, and Miss ——, three lovely young ladies, were at once organized into a powerful army, supported by several gentlemen. It was agreed that the ladies should get into Dr. Prichard's carriage, the gentlemen into A. S. Robertson's, it being owned by the "grand marshal," and that the corps should proceed quietly up to Gen. Taylor's encampment, (Col. Stewart's house) and carry it by a coup de main. The affair was entirely successful; the light artillery got on to the gallery of the house unperceived, as it was raining very hard at the time, and boldly entering the sally port, carried old Zack in fifteen seconds. At the time, he was firmly seated in a large red backed arm chair, Col. Stewart supporting him on the right, his accomplished lady on the left. The General on the first attack attempted to manœuvre, but it was a total failure; the ditch was on the wrong side, and the first general discharge of a little more grape of bright eyes set him in a fluttering, and with a few random shots he surrendered at discretion, long before the heavy artillery in the rear was brought into action. Old Zack, however, displayed considerable presence of mind, even under the novel position of defeat, and stipulated that he should ride to the wedding in the carriage with his cap-tiva-tors, and be treated otherwise with all the considerations of honorable warfare. I am sorry to add in this connection, that one of the young ladies fired several shots at Gen. Taylor's heart after he had "given up," but fortunately the aim missed, and killed two young gentlemen.

Gen. Taylor was instantly hurried off for fear of a rescue, as there were large forces of the enemy hovering about, all anxious to get him into their possession. He acted in a most resigned manner throughout, and as far as we could judge, showed a little of La Vega's spirit, at being rather pleased with his condition of prisoner. On arriving at Mr. Le Blanc's he was conducted with due ceremony into the crowded rooms. A buzz of excitement followed, and when the old General was seen, the waving of fair hands and loud shouts of Vive la Gen. Taylor, welcome Gen. Taylor, followed; a "bridal favor" was immediately pinned on his right shoulder, and another imprinted upon his lips, and he became the observed of all observers. Such an overwhelming and heartfelt reception we never before witnessed. The General was literally crushed under favors: he however maintained his position. It would be impossible for us to detail all the interesting incidents of the occasion, and perhaps it would not be proper for us to notice that the little grandson of Mr. Simon Le Blanc, who rejoices in the winning name of Zachary Taylor, was placed in the old General's arms, he prophecying that he was bound to be a General some of these days. This incident, so interesting in itself, and a hundred others, testifying the deep hold Gen. Taylor has upon the hearts of the people of Louisiana, we will not write, but abruptly end our letter, which but faintly records the events of the first day of Gen. Taylor's visit to Iberville.

On Wednesday morning Gen. Taylor pursued his journey down the coast, calling at the residences of Dr. Pritchard, A. S. Robertson, Edward Morse, John Hagan, Jr., and R. C. Camp, Esq. At Mr. Hagan's he was saluted with some remarkably fine music. At Mr. Camp's he crossed the river and was conducted to the residence of C. Adams, Esq., at which place was assembled a number of friends. The uncertainty of Gen. Taylor's movements made it impossible for the time of his visit to be given out, and consequently very many were debarred from paying him their respects. All who shook the old hero by the hand did it with a cordiality that came from the heart, and all endeavored to be foremost in paying him attention. It certainly was a curious thing to see Gen. Taylor among the rich sugar plantations of the coast, resembling in every particular of dress and manner a fine old farmer, and maintaining that appearence by the most devoted love for agricultural purposes, and entering into all their details with a practical knowledge that seems wholly incompatible with a life of forty years of active military service. In all the conversation we heard, little was said of politics and nothing of Mexico. The old General, however, talks freely and gives his opinions on all subjects with the utmost frankness. Whatever may be the notions of the world as to his aspirations, and although he would serve the people as President and discharge the duties of that responsible office with the highest ability, yet we are satisfied that Gen. Taylor's heart is with the tiller of the soil, and that he would rather be quiet in the humble home of the farmer than be surrounded with the power and pomp of the White House.

THE LIFE OF OLIVER CROMWELL. 1 vol., 12 mo. By J. T. HEADLEY, New York: Baker & Scrivner, 1848.

This book is not without slight imperfections in the style, but is, nevertheless, a very readable work. The author rightly affirms that CROMWELL has been maligned by many historians, and his character misunderstood by most people till within a short period of time. He has usually been considered a hypocrite, and but little confidence has been placed in his religious character. On this subject Mr. HEADLEY thus writes:

"Of his religious character we have already spoken. No one can read his letters without believing in his sincerity. The purity of God's Church on earth, was ever uppermost in his mind; and he strove to give Christianity that prominence in the nation it ought to hold, and must hold, to secure continued prosperity. Protestantism never had an abler or nobler champion. True, there was a great deal of cant in the religion of those times—probably there never was such a mixture of hypocrisy and sincerity, fanaticism and true godliness, as under the Commonwealth of England. When all were more or less affected by the spirit that was abroad, and men talked in Bible language, and troopers preached and prayed with each other, and parliament itself was frequently turned into a prayer meeting, it is not to be expected that Cromwell should be free from religious peculiarities. Probably one cause of the great influence he obtained over the soldiers, was the strong, religious excitement, that, at times, mastered him, and caused him to make those wild and stirring appeals which wrought them into such enuthusiasm. Frequently, just before an engagement, his eye would kindle, and his countenance light up with prophetic fire, and the words of Isaiah or David roll in tremulous accents from his quivering lips, till every sword leaped from its scabbard.

"In these respects he was unlike all other military leaders of modern times. He sung psalms when he went into battle, and consulted the Bible in his campaigns as much as his maps, and quoted Scripture to parliament—all of which may seem very weak in our day; but they detracted nothing from the strength and majesty of Cromwell's character. A strong, sincere and religious man—a Christian of Moses' time, if we may use the term, rather than of ours—who read the Old Testament much, and the Gospel little; pondered the dispensation of law, more than that of grace; understood the lofty language of David, better than the meek words of John; loved the commandments more than the beatitudes—a fierce fighter, a good ruler, and a stern patriot, was Oliver Cromwell. He is outliving his traducers; and will be honored by man long after thrones have been cast aside as useless things."

With a little less haste and a good deal more labor, the author of this book can secure for himself permanent and wide-spread fame. He who can write like the following scrap, which happily portrays the character of the invincible and immortal "Ironsides," is not without promise:

"These Ironsides were stern, religious men, who could sing psalms through their noses, and pray before going into battle; and he who would walk over the tented field at evening, and listen to their nasal chantings, might deem himself in a conventicle of of monks, and laugh at the thought of their being warriors; but he who saw them with their helmets on—their sabres shaking above their heads, and their flashing eyes bent in wrath on the enemy, sweeping like a thunder-cloud to battle, would ever after tread softly about their prayer meetings, and listen to their psalm singing, like one who hears music around the lip of the volcano."

NORTH BRITISH REVIEW, May, 1848, American edition—Vol. 4, No. 1. New York; Leonard Scott & Co.

The fourth volume of this young and manly Quarterly commenced this month. The degree of popularity which it has attained in Great Britian, is said to be almost unprecedented; and certainly it must be winning many and warm friends in this country. Liberal in its views; by no means strictly theological; and with its pages enriched by the best talent in our father land, it commends itself to the patronage of the thoughtful everywhere. From the last number, which contains half-a-dozen able and excellent papers, we make the following extract from a review of Foster's life of Goldsmith:

"Among the household of children too tremulously associated to the fluctuations of earth, stands forward conspicuously Oliver Goldsmith. And there is a belief current—that he was conspicuous, not only in the sense of being constitutionally flexible to the impressions of sorrow and adversity, in case they had happened to occur, but also that he really had more than his share of those afflictions. We are disposed to think that this was not so. Our trust is, that Goldsmith lived upon the whole a life which, though troubled, was one of average enjoyment. Unquestionably, when reading at midnight, and in the middle watch of a century which he never reached, this record of one so amiable, so guileless, so upright, or seeming to be otherwise for a moment only in the eyes of those who did not know his difficulties, nor could have understood them; when recurring also to his admirable genius, to the sweet natural gaiety of his oftentimes pathetic humour, and to the varied accomplishments from talents or erudition, by which he gave effect to endowments so fascinating—one cannot but sorrow over the strife which he sustained, and over the wrong by which he suffered. A few natural tears one sheds at the rehearsal of so much contumely from fools, which he stood under unresistingly as one bareheaded under a hail-storm; and worse to bear than the scorn of fools, was the imperfect sympathy and jealous self-distrusting esteem which he received to the last from friends. Doubtless he suffered much wrong; but so, in one way or other, do most men; he suffered also this special wrong, that in his life-time he never was fully appreciated by any one friend—something of a countermovement ever mingled with praise for him—he never saw himself enthroned in the heart of any young and fervent admirer, and he was always overshadowed by men less deeply genial, though more showy than himself; but these things happen, and have happened to myriads amongst the benefactors of earth. Their names ascend in songs of thankful commemoration, but not until the ears are deaf that would have thrilled to the music.—And these were the heaviest of Goldsmith's afflictions; what are likely to be thought such, viz: the battles which he fought for his daily bread, we do not number amongst them. To struggle is not to suffer. Heaven grants to few of us a life of untroubled prosperity, and grants it least of all to its favorites."

A General History of the Baptist Denomination in America and other parts of the world. By David Benedict. New York: Lewis Colby & Co. 1848.

This great work, complete in one octavo volume of nearly a thousand pages, is, we are informed by the author, the result of twenty-five years' labor. He has divided it into three parts, the first treating of Foreign Baptists from the introduction of Christianity to the Reformation, a period of fifteen centuries; the second of Authors on Baptism, including those who have written on both sides of the question, with a brief analysis of their several productions; and the third, of American Baptists. The last portion occupies more than half the volume, and aside from the account of the settlement and progress of the denomination in this new world, it contains numerous and "thrilling incidents connected with the early and self-denying labors of the fathers." The work is massy in historical and statistic intelligence, and must be very acceptable to the denomination the history of which it contains. It is handsomely printed and bound in a workman-like manner.

Bryant a Prophet.—The following lines are found in William Cullen Bryant's sublime poem entitled "The Winds." Recent events, says the editor of the Knickerbocker, for which magazine the poem was originally written, "recent events, which are filling European kingdoms with fear of change, perplexing monarchs, would seem to indicate that the prophecy is at least in progress of fulfilment:"

"Why rage ye thus?—no strife for liberty
Has made you mad; no tyrant, strong through fear,
Has chained your pinions till ye wrenched them free,
And rushed into the unmeasured atmosphere;
For ye were born in freedom where ye blow;
Free o'er the mighty deep to come and go;
Earth's solemn woods were yours, her wastes of snow,
Her isles where summer blossoms all the year.

"O ye wild winds! a mightier Power than yours,
In chains upon the shore of Europe lies:
The sceptred throng, whose fetters he endures,
Watch his mute throes with terror in their eyes.
And armed warriors all around him stand,
And as he struggles, tighten every band,
And lift the heavy spear, with threatening hand,
To pierce the victim should he strive to rise.

"Yet oh! when that wronged Spirit of our race,
Shall break, as soon he must, his long-worn chains,
And leap in freedom from his prison-place,
Lord of his ancient hills and fruitful plains;
Let him not rise, like these mad winds of air,
To waste the loveliness that time could spare
To fill the earth with woe, and blot her fair
Unconscious breast with blood from human veins.

"But may he like the Spring-time come abroad,
Who crumbles winter's gyves with gentle might,
When in the genial breeze, the breath of God,
Comes spouting up the unsealed springs to light:
Flowers start from their dark prisons at his feet:
The woods, long dumb, awake to hymnings sweet,
And morn and eve, whose glimmerings almost meet,
Crowd back to narrow bounds the ancient night."

The News by the Acadia.

☞ The steamship Acadia arrived on Saturday, bringing seven days later intelligence from Europe. We give below the details of the news brought by her:

FRANCE.

The festival at the Champ de Mars, which had been postponed from time to time, was held on the 21st inst. From an early hour of the morning the troops—cavalry, infantry and artillery—were in motion in various directions toward the Champ de Mars. The population which formed part of this vast spectacle assembled at points previously assigned, in an extensive line, extending from the Place de la Concorde, along the Boulevards, to the Place de la Bastille. At about 10 o'clock they began to move. Nothing can convey a better idea of this pantomime than a London Lord Mayor's show, upon a scale magnified about one hundred times.

The processions were classed according to trades, such as jewellers, glassworkers, bakers, silversmiths, shoemakers, &c. Each trade was preceded by a car or bier, supporting some characteristic emblematic structure, and adorned in some cases, by the most showy and beautiful specimens of their respective arts. Tri-colored cords extended usually from the canopies of these, which were held by ladies apparelled in white, with tri-colored ribbons decorating their hair, and in many instances furnished with parasols of white silk with tri-colored fringe. The large portion of those who composed the procession consisting of females, attired with more or less elegance and grace, gave a very pleasing effect to the solemnity.

The best point of view was from the heights of Chaillot, immediately overhanging the theatre of the spectacle, and offering a close bird's-eye view of the whole.

Innumerable tri-color drapeux and oriflamms floated over the field. The brilliant uniforms of the troops, especially those of several regiments of cuirassiers and lancers, sparkled in the sun. The Ecole Militaire was crowded with spectators, both on the windows and the roof. Galleries, erected along the sides and ends of the field, and tribunes constructed at regular intervals, from end to end of the area, were also filled. The field itself literally swarmed with human heads. The quays, bridges, and all the surrounding heights were quite alive with the populace. Artillery, stationed on the heights of Chaillot, thundered their salute unceasingly during the entire ceremony.

The Provisional Government and the members of the National Assembly took their seats about half-past nine, after which the different deputations filed before them. Among the deputations were several of foreigners, principally Poles, Germans, Italians and Belgians. A small party of Irish, consisting of not more than twelve persons, and carrying a little green flag, though not included in the programme, made their appearance, and after some demur, were allowed to follow the others. The troops then began to defile, and continued, without intermission, till past 3 o'clock. Then came the grand chariot of commerce and agriculture, and the deputations of the different trades peculiar to France, and especially to Paris.

Mr. Rush, the American Minister, has communicated a resolution to the Provisional Government, tendering the congratulations of the United States to the people of France on the revolution. The resolution was accompanied by the expression of the President's hope that France would be able to establish internal order, and to avoid foreign war. M. de Lamartine returned the following reply:

"The resolution which you present to us on the part of the Senate, the Legislative body, and the President of the American Republic, is a happy confirmation of the recognition of the French Republic which you were the first to proclaim. The new Government or the Republic would view with a just susceptibility foreign Governments mixing up counsel with the expression of their good wishes; but in the intimate relations which exist between the French Republic and that of America, every word which the latter may address to us will be received on the score of perpetual friendship. The Senate, the Legislative body, and the Executive power of the United States, may be convinced that their wise counsels serve in advance as a law to the French Republic; not only will it follow in their path, but it will follow the examples which they give of the order of regular institutions, of attention to its neighbors, of solicitude for labor, instruction, and the prosperity of the people. The names of Washington, Jefferson and Jackson are inscribed on the banner of the new Republic, and if France is fortunate enough to find in its future annals names worthy of these, Liberty will assume its real character on the Old Continent, as it has done on the other side of the Atlantic."

The City of Lyons was much disturbed on the 17th, particularly the neighborhood of the Croix-Rousse, in consequence of the uncertainty which prevailed as to the state of Paris. In the course of the night, about 500 or 600 men of the National Workshops traversed the town in arms, and proceeded to the residence of M. Martin-Bernard, the Government Commissary, to demand the enlargement of the prisoners. Some arrests took place. The workmen made a demonstration against the Palais de Justice, to get their comrades liberated. The accounts since received from Lyons are of a most deplorable character.—Disturbances commenced in that city on the morning of the 19th instant, which continued throughout the day, and assumed in the evening a truly serious character. Barricades were erected, and the red flag once more hoisted. The prisoners arrested on the previous day had been liberated on the injunction of the revolters. The local authorities were no longer recognised, and the insurgents were masters of the city. Fresh disorders appeared imminent. On the 22d, the situation of Lyons was very alarming. Almost all the barricades which had been erected are still standing, with the exception of those near the Bernardins.

A bloody conflict has taken place at Toulon, between the troops and the operatives of the dockyards, the latter of whom had seized the arsenal.

Some sensation has been created by the publication, in the Presse, of a diary, said to be kept by the Prince de Joinville, and from the liberal spirit which characterizes it throughout, and the sentiments of devotedness toward France (independent of its being a Monarchy or Republic) with which it is overspread, we should not wonder if it would produce a deep impression in favor of the journalist, who was always a favorite with the French people. It will be borne in mind that M. de Girardin, Editor of the Presse, is not a Republican, and the appearance of this diary at the present juncture, may be a stroke of policy on the part of ex-royal family. A correspondence between the Prince and a friend in Paris is also published in the Presse.

It appears that the Committee of the Assembly has recommended the adoption of a decree of banishment against the Orleans family. The Committee on the Constitution, which sits daily, is said to be in favor of proposing a plan which will include only fundamental basis, without details, as being the most likely means to enable the Assembly to come to an immediate decision.

The President of the National Assembly announced on the 28th that he had received a letter from the Prince de Joinville and the Duc d'Aumale, and another from the Duc de Nemours, which he proposed to refer to the Committee of the decree as to Louis Philippe and his family.

A great number of voices: Read! read! (Lively, curiosity was excited in all parts of the Assembly.)

The President then read the following letters, received from the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale and the Prince de Joinville:

MAY 19, 1848.

M. LE PRESIDENT: The public journals inform us of a projected decree to exclude us altogether from France. The sentiments with which that project inspires us removes the reserve which till now we had imposed upon ourselves. We had hoped that this reserve, entirely patriotic, would have been appreciated. The Assembly met; it proceeded, in its independence and its sovereignty, to vote for the new Constitution, and we did not wish in the midst of its deliberations to occupy it with the expression of our personal wishes.

We considered that, in quitting Algiers at the first appeal to our patriotism, we furnished to the country a solemn proof of our firm intention not to disunite France, as we had testified the respect with which we accepted the appeal made to the nation.

We flatter ourselves, therefore, that the country cannot think of repelling us who have always loyally and faithfully served it, in our professions, whether naval or military.

The project of the decree, however, shows that some have thought otherwise, and the moment chosen to produce it constitutes, beside, an assimilation which we cannot accept.

Exempt from all personal ambition, we protest, before the representatives of the nation, against a measure from which a knowledge of our previous services and our sentiments should have guaranteed us.

Deign, sir, to place this letter before the National Assembly, and receive the assurance of our high consideration.

(Signed) FRANCOIS D'ORLEANS.
HENRI D'ORLEANS.

COMMITTEES OF THE GOVERNMENT.—The Committee on the Decree of Exile of the Orleans family are MM. Altaroche, Bourbeau, Babaud-Laridiere Woirhaye, Isambert, Gen. Duvivier, Nogue, Mathieu (de la Drome,) Germain Sarrot, Emile Leroux, Auberger, Bidault, Jules Richard, Maurat-Ballarge, Marchal, Dornes, Conti, and Ceyras.

The following are the descriptions of the members composing the Committee appointed by the Assembly to propose the project of the Constitution:

President, M. de Cormenin, ex-deputy, President of the Council of State.

Secretary, M. Corbon (operative,) Editor of the Atelier, Vice-President of the National Assembly.

Members, M. M. Armand Marrast, Mayor of Paris; L'Abbe Lamennais; Vivie, ex-deputy, ex-Minister of Justice, ex-Vice-president of Council of State; Alexis de Tocqueville, ex-deputy, Member of the Institute, author of "Democracy in America;" Dufaure, ex-deputy, ex-Minister of Public Works; Martin (de Strasbourg) ex-deputy, Advocate at the Court of Appeal; Woirhaye, Procureur General of Court of Appeal at Metz; Coquerel, Protestant Minister; Tourret (de l'Allier,) ex-deputy, agriculturist; Dupin, ex-deputy, Procureur General of Court of Appeal; Gustave de Beaumont, ex-deputy, Member of Institute, author of "l'Irelande, Social and Politique;" Odillon Barrot, ex-deputy; Pages (de l'Ariege,) ex-deputy; Dornez, editor of National; Considerant, chief editor of the Democratic Pacifique.

The committee of which M. Cormenin is president, sits daily for several hours. M. Cormenin has been authorised to prepare a draft of a constitution. M. Lamennais (who, it will be recollected, lately published a project of a constitution for the Republic) has resigned his seat in the commission. From this it may be inferred that the ideas of the ex-Abbe are not in harmony with those of the majority of the committee.

The committee appointed to examine the project de loi regulating the relations between the Executive and the National Assembly, has, it is said, rejected altogether the clause in the bill which gave the Executive Government the power either to sit in the Assembly or not, according to its own choice, and also the clause which restricts the power of the President of the Assembly. The importance of this resolution is greatly increased by the fact of there being a serious schism in the Executive Government itself, of which the committee was officially informed, together with an intimation that, if any change was made in the bill, it would have the effect of endangering the existence of the Government. It is reported that M. Lamartine and Ledru Rollin have declared that they are prepared to give in their resignations, and that MM. Arago, Garnier Pages, and Marie have resolved to remain in office.

Indications have already been manifested of the intention of those in authority to let the chief conspirators, now confined at Vincennes, escape.—Barbes attempted lately to walk out of the chetean and make off, and very nearly succeeded. Two of his three guards connived at his escape, but the third arrested him in the act of going out.—He has been hitherto confined in the ground-floor of the "Donjon." On this attempt being made known to the Governor he was transferred to a room in the upper story. No one, however, believes in his ultimate punishment, at least so long as the present Government remains in office.

DUBLIN, Friday Night, half past 6.

At ten o'clock the Judges having taken their seats on the bench, and the names of the jurors having been called over, the Attorney General stated the case for the prosecution.

Mr. Charles Vernon, two Police Constables, Mr. Pierce, George Barron and Mr. Virge, a tax collector, were called to prove the publication complained of.

After which Mr. Holmes addressed the Court in a very able speech on behalf of Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. Henn, Q. C. having been heard in reply, Judge Moore charged the Jury, who retired at a quarter past four o'clock.

We learn by a telegraphic despatch, which reached the Mail steamer after sailing, that, after three hours deliberation, the Jury returned into Court with a verdict of GUILTY against John Mitchell.

The Attorney General stated the case in a long and able speech, and adduced evidence to prove the delivery by the prisoner of the sentiments charged as felony.

Anniversary Meetings.

Boston, June 3.

American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.—This Society met at the Tremont Temple on Thursday evening. Its Committee made the following statement:

Missionaries sent forth.—Since May of last year, nine of the Missions have been reinforced—the South African, Syrian, Nestorian, Bombay, Madura, China, Sandwich Islands, Cherokee, and Choctaw—by fourteen ordained missionaries, and sixteen assistant missionaries; thirty in all.

New Missionaries under Appointment.—Nineteen clerical missionaries are under appointment, from seven theological seminaries, with two missionary physicians, and other assistant missionaries. These are all much needed in the missions, and are expected to embark during the year to come; nearly all of them in the autumn. Two have been set apart for a mission to the Jews at Salonica, (anciently Thessalonica,) in European Turkey. Several applications for appointments as missionaries are now before the Prudential Committee.

The Missions.—The system under the care of the Board, contains 26 missions, about 100 stations, 150 ordained missionaries, 4 licensed preachers, 32 lay helpers, and 204 female assistant missionaries; in all 390 sent from this country. Associated with these, are 25 native preachers, and about 100 other native helpers; making 515 laborers among the heathen, who are dependant on the treasury of the Board for their means of support. In these missions are 75 churches, containing upwards of 26,000 members; 33 seminaries and boarding schools, containing 1,358 boarding scholars; 367 free schools, containing about 12,000 pupils; and 11 printing establishments, at which about 600,000,000 of pages have been printed, from the beginning, in 30 languages. The common schools at the Sandwich Islands, containing 18,000 pupils, are now wholly supported by the native government.

The Finances.—Though so many missionaries have been sent forth, the Prudential Committee have felt the necessity of keeping down the expenses in the missions; and the estimated expenditure of the financial year ending with July next, does not exceed that of the last year by more than $6,000. It could not have been made less, without violence. This will make the year's expenditure $270,000. Add the debt of last year, amounting to $31,000, and the proper expenditure of the year would be $301,000. And what are likely to be the receipts? These have been $178,000 for the first nine months, or $33,000 (nearly 25 per cent.) more than during the same period of time last year. Should there be an equal advance upon the receipts in the three remaining months the receipts of the current year will be $260,000; and the indebtedness of the Board will be about $41,000; it is at present about $60,000. The advance of 40 per cent., recommended by the special committee to which the subject was referred by the Board at Buffalo, would have paid the expenses of the year, and freed the Board from debt. An advance to that amount in the remaining months of the year, will meet the current expense and leave the debt as it was a year ago.

It should be remembered, that the last financial year commenced with a balance in the treasury of $22,000, the result of an extraordinary legacy; that the monthly receipts had then fallen below the necessary expenditure; and that they are yet below it. This is the reason why the balance is still on the wrong side. Shall the Board be enabled to enter upon its next year free from embarrassment? Shall it send out the goodly company of missionaries now under appointment, without the necessity of curtailing, for this purpose, the expenditure in the several missions?

"Old Ironsides."—The favorite U. S. frigate Constitution, which has been in the Dry Dock at Charlestown, since February last, was taken out of the dock on Saturday, having been thoroughly repaired from stem to stern. She is to be fitted for sea with all despatch. Her destination as yet is not known.—Boston Times.

This old national vessel is consecrated by veneration for the services she has seen, and above all her name. Not many years since, the Navy Department ordered her to be destroyed, and she was rescued from the workmen's hands by the opportune appearance of Holmes' beautiful ode commencing—

> Aye, tear her tattered ensign down!
> Long has it waved on high,
> And many an eye has danced to see
> That banner in the sky.

The order was countermanded, and the venerable old craft repaired. Long may she yet float the briny deep.

An Infamous Character.—The following statements come to us vouched for by respectable authority:

For some time past, a young lady of excellent character and respectable family, has had left at her residence a number of anonymous communications, purporting to be written by a gentleman, but known to be written by a certain woman, in a disguised hand. They are of a most infamous and vulgar import, the design of which is well understood. During the same period, certain gentlemen have been receiving from the same infamous female, letters purporting to be written to them by the lady first mentioned, inviting them to dishonorable connections, and assigning a time for meeting on certain evenings. The lady, unaware of any such designs upon her character, has received occasional insults in the street, it is supposed by some of the individuals who have received those letters to which her name was affixed by that infamous character.—Boston Traveller.

Messrs. Editors:—In my note book of 1831, on the 20th of June, I made the following entry:

"Locusts have visited us in immense numbers. From this place to Buffalo, south as far as Geneseo, east some 20 or 30 miles, how much farther I am not informed, they have covered the country. They will appear again in 1848. This is no prophecy. They are a most singular animal. They live in the earth seventeen years, appear in May—live about 20 or 25 days, lay their eggs in the branches of trees, in the last year's growth, then die. In sixty days the egg is hatched, drops to the ground, which the worm or larva immediately begins to enter and continues to descend for several years (probably.) They have been found seventeen and twenty feet under ground, how much farther they go is not known. One man tells me he found them five years ago (1826) 10 feet deep; another informs me that three years since (1828) he found them 6 feet. This would seem to indicate nearly the time of their progress upward."

I observed in the American of yesterday, the announcement that these insects, cicada septemdecem, have made their appearance about Avon and a few other places in this vicinity, confirming the above prediction. W. W. R.

Italian Patriotic Song.

TRANSLATED BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Hear ye the trumpet that calls to the combat?
Up with your banner to stream in the sky!
Children of Italy, forward together!
Bravely in battle to conquer or die.

Down with the Austrians, with kings and with cowards!
Spurned be their bribes, and their tortures defied,
Freedom for Italy! what if we perish?
Greatly we perish on Liberty's side.

Matrons, come forth, with the old men and children,
Grasping your weapons at Liberty's call.
Charge on the tyrants, the foes of your country—
Foes who for ages have held her in thrall,

Loud be the cry, that for battle and vengeance,
Rises from millions on Italy's shore;
She shall be free, and her children united,
Slaves to the Austrian despot no more!
She shall be free, or we sleep in our graves—
Better die bravely, than live to be slaves.

HEDGES.—The best hedge in the United States, says the Genesee Farmer, extends about a mile along the highway on a plantation of 3,000 acres, near Augusta, Georgia. It is the Cherokee rose, which is now in full bloom, presenting a magnificent floral spectacle, and filling the atmosphere with delicious perfume. No animal without wings can get over, or through it. Having stood forty or fifty years it still promises a good fence for another century to come. The owner and occupant of this splendid estate, Mr. D'Laigle, was a St. Domingo planter at the time of the insurrection and dreadful massacre by the blacks, and was so fortunate as to escape to the United States.

A PROFITABLE EMPLOYMENT.—There is a citizen in Connecticut, who is a Justice of Peace and keeper of a Hotel. As Justice, he unites in the holy bonds of matrimony all runaway couples, and as host entertains them at the hotel during the honey-moon. By this Gretna Green process, he is supposed to have taken $500 in matrimonial fees during the past year, besides heavy tavern bills, and there is no law which can prevent the Justice from marrying parties or entertaining them at his hotel. There is no recapturing fugitives, who are in sight of his tavern.

SAN JACINTO PAT.—This celebrated Indian Chief, who is carrying such terror into the white settlements of Yucatan, is of Irish descent. His father was an Irishman of great weight and influence with the Yucatecos, and his mother is an Indian woman. He is possessed of great courage, activity and firmness, and in many respects strongly resembles Carrera, the Indian President of Guatemala. San Jacinto belongs to the Young Irelanders, and is a strong advocate of the physical force doctrine.—N. O. Delta, May 12.

A NEW RAT TRAP.—Take a tub or kettle, fill it to within six inches of the top with water, cover it with chaff or bran, and place it at night where the rats resort. By this method thirty-six rats have been taken in one night.

A Kentucky roarer declares that since he has signed the teetotal pledge he has drank the Mississippi water by the gallon. "Talk to me of a man eating a peck of dirt in a life time," said he, "why I have only been swallowing that sediment for a month, and am already chuck full of sandbars, snags, rafts, islands, and sunken flatboats, and never was healthier in my life."

THE WHALE FISHERY.—The accounts from the Kamschatka fleet of whalers are said to be bad. Upwards of fifty vessels are reported as having done nothing. There have been several shocks of earthquakes felt at sea in that region, which are supposed to have frightened the whales off their usual feeding grounds.

Musings.

BY MISS ALICE CARY.

How solemn seems the midnight sky—
How cold its starry splendor,
In the sweet summertimes gone by
I thought its light so tender!

I cannot make my spirit still
Its wild and weary crying,
For nurse delusion as I will
I know my hopes are dying!

Yet would I be with God alone,
This grief my heart is wringing;
The semblance of a human tone
So like a serpent's stinging!

The dew is on the morning buds
With every day's returning,
And faintly o'er the sunset woods
The crimson fires are burning.

But not the morning's buds of dew,
Nor evening's red and amber,
Can lay the dim ghosts gliding thro'
My heart's still haunted chamber.

Address.

Delivered before the Erie County Agricultural Society, at its Annual Meeting, September 2d, 1847.

BY GEO. W. CLINTON, ESQ.

GENTLEMEN:—Permit me to indulge a feeling, entertained I have no doubt in common with all who have witnessed this exhibition, and to thank you for the great pleasure I have enjoyed in beholding the manifold proofs you have produced, of the prosperous condition of Agriculture in our County. Inexpert as I am, I am sensible that you have cause for honest pride in the contemplation of your past achievements, and to augur well of the future usefulness of your Society. Would it were in my power to render you substantial aid in the prosecution of your laudable objects. But, while neither my education nor mode of life have qualified me to advise you in your course, nor to add to your stock of agricultural information, I cannot flatter myself that any eulogy I can pronounce upon the noble occupation to which you are devoted, can add to your zeal for its improvement, or to a proper appreciation of the dignity and importance of a farmer's avocations. Indeed, after I had reluctantly yielded to a kindly opportunity it would have been very difficult to resist, and consented to address you, and began to consider how I should discharge the duty I had undertaken, I soon became impressed with a sincere distrust of my ability to accomplish it with credit to myself, or benefit to your Society, and had nearly abandoned in despair all attempt at preparation. But after-reflection has heartened me to the task. The farmers of Erie County, on this auspicious day, will cheerfully overlook the deficiencies of a well-meant effort for their gratification; and besides, the bare fact that a denizen of the city, a dweller among pavements, a mere lawyer, takes a cordial and public part in your proceedings may not be without its uses.—You at least, will I trust, accept it as some evidence of the truth, that enlightened citizens, however alien to agriculture their pursuits may be, everywhere honor it as the basis of civilization and primary source of wealth, that they respect your employment, and regard with the deepest interest the efforts which this and kindred institutions are putting forth to promote the prosperity of our country.

In the few remarks I purpose uttering, I may have something to say of the honor, dignity, and utility of agriculture, and the felicity of your condition. But, despising flattery as I do, and careful as I would be to avoid the imputation of employing it, it seems right that I should explain as briefly as I can, the sense in which I, and you also I presume, accept such phrases.

Time was when men throughout the world were consigned by public opinion to honor or dishonor, according to their employments. Such indeed is yet the case in almost every portion of the earth. Men were, and are still divided into ranks or castes differing in glory, or rather sinking, in the arbitrary estimation of the world, from the all-honored to the utterly-contemned. These ranks were not determined by any standard of utility to the commonwealth, or graduated by any rule of right reason. They were and are the offspring of tyranny, and maintained by power.—They are opposed as well to the deductions of reason, as to the spirit of the Bible, to which we are indebted for the revelation of the common origin of our species, and the equal inherent nobility of all men. God "created man in His own image," and in His providence He has distributed among the children of Adam a vast variety of avocations, all of which contribute to the general happiness, and in every of which, when faithfully discharged, man can find contentment and maintain his moral elevation. True indeed it is, that these distinctions, especially when of long endurance, are apt to find an apparent apology for their existence and continuance, in the physical, mental and moral inferiority of the so-called lower classes. But the squalid operative, and the collier of England, who is often born in the bowels of the earth, in whose depths rather than on whose surface he had his being—the miserable peasant of Ireland, the soil-bound serf of Russia, the loathed Paria of India, all the wretched of the earth who are trampled down by their fellow men, are still human, the descendants of our common parents, the creatures of the just God, who will surely avenge the wrongs and indignities they suffer. Their employments, being useful, are worthy, and the dishonor of them is only the false attribution of their oppressors, whose oppressiveness is the fruit of a moral degredation even more intense than the debasement it brings upon its victims.

In all ages, and in almost all nations, this perverse propensity to separate men into castes or classes, and to visit some with honor and others with dishonor, has been exhibited mainly at the expense of the tillers of the soil. The noble, the soldier, the merchant, the artizan, have been almost universally accounted superior to the cultivator of the ground. He, poor bee, was the drudge who worked that the higher orders might live at ease in the fulfilment of their more elevated functions in the scale of being; and, more especially in lands famed for fertility, was too frequently a slave, a bondsman, a villian, or a serf, bereft of all, or nearly all the attributes of manhood. Agriculture was indeed adored under a variety of names, by the heathen world. Her priests were pampered, and kings and warriors brought offerings to her altars. But it was the beuificent earth, the Common Mother, Agriculture in the abstract, that was so worshipped, and whose praises were sounded by poets and by sages. The miserable laborers who made earth beautiful and productive of corn, and oil, and wine, were more or less imbruted by contempt and wretchedness. I am speaking of the condition of the world in the earlier and middle ages I know that in the origin of society, agriculture, being an occupation of imperative necessity, must have been generally pursued. Men appealed to the earth from which they sprung, for food, and labored to continue life. In the first rise of empires too, it has sometimes happened that great men were inured to rural labor, and cultivated their petty patrimonial possessions of choice. But, in perusing the history of any nation of antiquity, we invariably discover that the true appreciation of agriculture was transient and of brief duration. The frugal founders of cities and dynasties, and self-denying heroes, may indeed have put their own hands to the plough, and their successors may have preserved the custom as a gorgeous exhibition, a politic ceremony, or a religious rite; but reverence for husbandry pined as the lust of conquest grew, and perished with the prosecution of successful wars. Citizens were replaced in the fields by barbarian captives, and effeminacy, contemning labor, followed in the train of luxury. As it was in antiquity, and during the feudal ages, so is it still in the greater portion of the globe. The actual cultivators of the earth nowhere, save in this and a few European countries, enjoy a respectable position. In Europe large land-holders may indeed be honored, and do devote themselves zealously and intelligently to the promotion of agriculture. But these are the aristocracy, the honorable, the titled, the wealthy proprietors. Very many of them have indeed been wakened to a sense of humanity, and find their own interests best subserved by liberality towards their tenantry. But what of the tenantry at large, even in merry England—what of the under-tenants—what of the poor Irish—what of those who sow and reap in whole districts and empires of Europe, and who are in fact, whatever they may be in name, affixed to the soil they till as surely as were ever the collared Saxon thrall? Are they among the first ranks of morality and intelligence—are they honored? We will not pursue the inquiry. But we may with great confidence assert, that, in no part of the world do agriculturists attain so high a position, as in the free states of our Union: and we may also safely add, that the farmers are indebted for the deserved position of equality they here enjoy, to the circumstances of the country, the equity of our institutions, and their own department, rather than to any disposition of the masses to exalt agriculture above other employments, or to any intrinsic superiority of that pursuit.

If there be a glory peculiar to our country, if its institutions have evolved for us any super-excellent blessing, we may be assured that that singular honor, and that transcendent felicity, are solely derivative from the facts, that the dignity of our common nature is everywhere conceded, that all honest labor is considered reputable, and that all arbitrary divisions of the people into orders are derided. We have approached, and Heaven grant that we may speedily arrive at the desirable conclusions, that all men are equal in the view of Omnipotent Goodness, equal in fundamental rights and in the majesty of manhood; that, although there are differences in capacity and attainments, and diversities of occupation, yet every man is equally bound to work out with earnestness his own good and the good of his neighbor; and that they who labor in the vale and they who toil upon the mountain, so that they pursue good with similar fidelity and zeal, are brothers of similar desert. We must judge men, not by their costume, nor by their position in society, but by their demeanor in their respective callings. This is Christian doctrine—this is the vital spirit of our institutions.—Clergyman, priest, mechanic, lawyer, farmer, laborer,—these are but indifferent additions, and entitle no man to place a precedence in public estimation. Callings and pursuits are but the fields in which men signalize their qualities and prove their worth. The patient ox is as respectable as a brutal farmer; a petty thief, or midnight robber, is not more flagitious than a dishonest lawyer, or a hypocritical profaner of God's altar.

It is true indeed that the arts and sciences differ in the directness of their application to the satisfaction of our bodily necessities and mental cravings; and hence some may be said to be fundamental, and others to be built thereon. But while they differ in position, they harmonize in the edifice: and it is the edifice, and not the components, that yields us shelter and protection. It is in vain that they who would magnify their own worth by exalting their particular pursuit, prate of utility as a true ground of distinction. What honest employment is destitute of use? The farmer feeds the body, but does it therefore follow that the mechanic and the mariner are drones? The lawyer has shown himself a jealous guardian, and a skilful artificer of that freedom under which all thrive, the schoolmaster and the author busy themselves with intellectual culture, and the priest in the care of souls: and what can be more ennobling than liberty, more glorious than intelligence, more transcendently important than the health of the ever-during soul? Are farmers and artizans therefore mere superfluities in the economy of the world? But it is said we cannot live without agriculture. I doubt it, that is I think it certain, that if the earth were utterly untilled, it would still be tenanted, not as now by a teeming population, but by a comparitively small number of human beings. We would have as now, within the tropics, fruit-eaters;—in the temperate zones, hunters, shepherds, and fish-eaters;—in the extreme north, the Laplander and the Esquimaux would still find their sum of happiness in the rein deer and the seal;—there would be everywhere gatherers of fruits and berries, and diggers of roots, the spontaneous productions of the good earth:—and the beautiful sea, and the fertilizing rivers in their courses would still be kind to man, and tender him their life-sustaining gifts.

But then the improvement that agriculture has effected! True, it has beautified the earth exceedingly, and added prodigiously to the value of our existence. But who have armed agriculture for these achievements? Whence does the farmer derive his tools, his comforts, his markets, his all of happiness, security and ease beyond mere food and shelter? From the miner, the miller, the mechanic, the fisherman, the sailor, the statesman, the lawyer, the author, the priest.—It is the highest boast of Agriculture that it has called these classes of employment into being. Whence came the minor improvements of agriculture? From the meteorologist, the navigator, the mechanic, the geologist, the zoologist, the botanist, the chemist. What would be the condition of the farmer, were there not a great number of equally honorable employments for men to exercise their arms and minds in? If land were the only, or the chief source of sustenance, who could occupy it in peace? No, my friends! when we talk of the great benefits that man has reaped exclusively from any one of our pursuits, we talk idly—no great good ever sprung from any single cause, unless that cause were God. Even as our individual faculties and powers conjoin to make the perfect man, so the co-adaptation of our different pursuits binds us together in one mutually dependent happy state. A nation of farmers, if possible, would be but a horde of barbarians; a purely mechanical people would be a miserable, dependent band of slaves. The true strength of a country, the surest guaranty of its happiness and independence, resides in free public institutions, and in the consequently unrestrained diversity of private occupations.

But while we claim no individual honor from our avocations, and attribute no superior intrinsic excellence to any employment, we find an honest pleasure in tracing to the pursuit we are engaged in, the inclination of the condition of our race, and the rise of nations in power and wealth. We find too, in the anticipation of greater good to be derived from it, a noble incentive to exertion for its improvement, and a just ambition to promote it, and so to act well our part in life, remembering always that others of other callings must be co-workers, and that success is glorious because of universal benefit.

In these particulars you, in common with all the votaries of agriculture and all men, have cause to honor agriculture, and be grateful to those who have improved its implements and processes, and raised it to the rank of a profound and complex science. You have also great reason for thankfulness, that Providence has placed you in so desirable a pursuit, where labor is surely and sufficiently rewarded, which is so conducive to health and peace, so favorable to moral and mental culture, and where so much, as we are confident, remains to be achieved for the good of our great country and of the whole human race.

Vallet calls agriculture "the nursing mother of the state." The great and good Duke of Sully says, "Agriculture and Pasture are the two great breasts of nature from which creatures receive their nourishment." Such are the figurative, but deserved and exalted eulogies of the most profound philosophy and wisest statesmanship. Agriculture is in some sense entitled to pre-eminence above manufactures and commerce, science and literature. It precedes and prepares the way for them. It takes precedence ever as the pursuit graciously assumes the place of honor among his offspring, and it deserves and receives the reverence and aid of grateful children.

Were it not for agriculture one's life would be fully occupied in the procurement of sustenance, and war and rapine would constantly deform the world. Man would be a solitary animal, or would unite rather for plunder than security; at best, peace would be insecure, the arts of peace would be but rude and few, and science would but faintly glimmer over the human mind. But the earth pours abundance into the hands of agriculture.—The excess produced beyond the wants of those who till the soil, flows abroad freely, and maintains in plenty the immense numbers who occupy other departments of industry, gladdens the heart of poverty, and gives leisure for the prosecution of the arts and the elevation of the sciences. And, in the great circle of existence the arts and sciences return reverently to agriculture, and sustain, and guide, and renovate her. All conjoin in producing happiness, and calm contentment paves the way to Heaven. Religion flourishes most where men are nobly happy.

It is said that the wealth and not the numbers of a people make their strength. This is true, if it mean that the comparative power of nations of the same population is determined by the sufficiency and diffusion of wealth among their people,—understanding always by wealth, the primary elements of comfort and contentment, food and shelter, and their ordinary consequences, intelligence and love of liberty. But the comparative numbers of their people who are wealthy in this sense, and who are attached to the land in which, and the institutions under which they live happily, must form the surest criteria of their power for noble ends,—the preservation of internal liberty, the defence of their country, and the increase of its energies. Furnishing as it does the main supply of food, agriculture is the great primary source of all prosperity, and it seems to me plain, "that population ought to be subordinate to agriculture, so that the abundance of produce shall always precede the increase of population," (note Sir Arthur Young,) and that "all the numerous arts and manufactures of the modern world, by which such numbers appear to be supported, have no tendency whatever to increase population, except so far as they tend to increase the quantity and facilitate the distribution of the products of agriculture," (note Malthus.)

These remarks sufficiently indicate the fundamental importance of agriculture to every country, but they also point out the great part it has yet to play in the development of the wealth of our own rich land. "The abundance of agriculture" must "precede the increase of population," so that every vacant portion of our immense territory, now scarcely occupied, may be filled with happy beings. The abundant produce of the earth which makes glad the hearts of men, has always anticipated and still anticipates the mighty wave of immigration. Our agriculture, from its fullness, has relieved the misery of a destitute continent, and fed here her thousands and tens of thousands, who for years have been speeding their way hither, to secure a refuge from oppression, immunity from famine, and homes in a land of plenty. And wonderful as have been the accessions to our numbers, our agricultural wealth has always outstripped them, and is ever in the advance. This state of things, happy as it seems, has awakened fears in the minds of many patriotic and far-seeing men. They ask where a sufficient market can be found for this vast and swelling quantity of produce. I cannot pretend to furnish an authoritative answer, but you will, I trust, excuse me for diffidently expressing some thoughts suggested by this query.

Markets are either domestic or foreign. The former are the most certain, but are and must be for many years inadequate to the consumption of our agricultural produce. The surplus must find vent and leave the country, or a surplus must cease to be produced. That our productions will steadily and rapidly increase for a long time to come seems universally admitted; that our power of consumption will not increase in the same ratio is equally assumed by all. That the number of our consumers will be largely augmented by immigration and natural increase, and that great additions will be made to our hosts of citizens professional men, manufacturers, miners, merchants, and sailors, all of whom must rely upon the farmer for bread, is true; but that with them will be swollen also the numbers of our growers of wheat and corn, and of the acres annually subdued by the plough, is claimed to be as evident. I disclaim all title by study, or deep reflection, to pronounce positive opinions upon these high matters; but I have seen some years and have thought somewhat on these subjects. It seems to me that these apprehensions are not new, and that they have always hitherto turned out to be fallacious; that we always have had, and always must have foreign markets, and that the extent of the demands of those markets, especially under the more liberal commercial spirit which now pervades the world, must, to a great degree, be graduated by the extent and cheapness of our supplies for them; that our people are not so eager to subdue the wilderness, as to be insensible to the operation of those laws that govern men in other business, and will not persist in agriculture when they cannot sell its fruits with reasonable profit: that, whatever markets may be open to, will be filled with our produce; and that with the failure or inadequacy of foreign consumption, our people will readily be diverted from farming and become consumers on our own soil. I am persuaded too that the rates of the increase of our home consumption is not justly appreciated. All professions are rapidly augmenting, our fisheries are expanding, mines are everywhere being opened, internal improvements are being resumed, factories are rising in all parts of the land, the mechanical arts are receiving large accessions to their pursuers, wealth is invoking labor to build its edifices and execute its phantasies, new arts are daily calling hundreds and thousands to employment, and our cities are receiving an unprecedented impulse. I have no fear but that our country will maintain that happy admixture of pursuits, and that just proportion of their pursuers, which will best administer to the happiness of all; and that so far as foreign countries may desire it, she will yield them food. The extent of the reliable annual foreign demand has not, to my knowledge, been estimated. It is highly important that it should be. It must be large, but I do not see how it can be much expanded, save temporarily by famine, or permanently by a diversion of the people of foreign countries from agriculture to manufactures, in which case they cannot buy from, unless they sell to us, and, if they sell to us, they in fact merely substitute, to that extent, a foreign for a home market. I throw out these suggestions, gentlemen, rather as matters worthy of your consideration, than as settled conclusions of my own. Your interests—the cardinal interests of our country, are deeply involved in them. I pass with pleasure to other themes.

Your occupations are calm and ennobling—such as wise and good men have in all ages coveted. They are equally attractive to youth and age, present a happy alternation of necessary labor and delightful ease, and favor our growth in mental stature and moral strength. The farm or the garden are, in the eyes of most men, the pleasant, wished for termination of their toils. There is something in dealing with mother earth and witnessing her miracles, which has a charm for all right minded mortals. We suffer in camps, seek fortune on the seas, and toil in cities, in the hope of at last reposing in the country and resting there in our long sleep. How many of our illustrious men have signalized their innate love of nature by such a course! I will refrain from dwelling on the long list, and mention but a few. There was Washington the well-beloved. Two at least who were near and dear to me occur as instances,—one was my father—the other almost as dear and kind, a second father. The first, though he died in the city, had ever his heart with nature, and loved his little farm: and Ambrose Spencer, after a long life of public service, has lived many years in the quiet of his garden in the country, winning the love of all men.—May I not mention too the statesman of whom death so recently bereft us. He had his errors—who has not? Imperfect justice has as yet been rendered to the great and endearing qualities of Silas Wright, but the time has not yet come to speak his eulogy. He was a farmer of choice, and, in the cultivation of his farm at Canton, he found an easy solace for political mischances—He has left you, in the last effort of his intellect, a legacy worthy of being treasured up, and an enduring proof of his attachment to your pursuits.

Your occupation is noble, and, with a due appreciation of your lot, you are most favored by Providence. It brings, however, with every blessing a duty, and every duty performed is truly a better blessing. Your felicity is attributable to the Author of all good, and under Him to the institutions of our dear country. I have sought briefly and hurriedly to show you that those free institutions are the main cause of the honorable estimation you enjoy. They are in a great measure in your hands, as one of the most numerous, intelligent, and influential classes of citizens.—And surely you will endeavor to honor them by your deportment, and to preserve their purity unsullied by faction, and their integrity complete amid the storms of party.

To the noble employment by which you prosper, and to your country, you owe another duty—the elevation of agriculture both as an art and science, and your local position must contribute to urge you to its performance. In many agricultural staples this county cannot compete with the cheap and fertile soil of the exuberent West. Improvements in commercial intercourse bring down these staples from the west, with a rapidity and in amounts that threaten to abridge your reasonable profits, or drive you from the market.—What remedy have you? Why nature opens in our county both "her great breasts from which nations draw their nourishment"—pasture and agriculture are both yours. There in our city you have a convenient and ready place of sale for a thousand products of the earth in which none can there compete with you: and in many other products, from your proximity to market, you have eminent advantage. But above all, it is by careful, skilful culture, such as will educe the full powers of production your fields possess, that you will most enhance their value. And here, science if invoked, will aid you effectually, and shield you from all fear of injury. She will make abundant compensation for inferior fertility, and countervail the benefits of nature and of commerce to the west.

But I must not detain you longer—I thank you for the patience with which you have listened to my crudities. I thank you again for the evidence you have furnished of the high agricultural position of Erie County, and I wish you all honor and happiness in your most laudable pursuits.—May every season add to your peaceful triumphs, and exalt the agriculture of our county, in all its branches.

A Receipt for Happiness.—An exchange gives the following excellent piece of advice, which is by no means bad to take. It is simply when you rise in the morning to form a resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow creature. It is easily done—a left off garment to a man that needs it; a kind word to the sorrowful; an encouraging expression to the striving—trifles in themselves as light as air—will do at least for the twenty-four hours, and if young, depend upon it, it will tell to you when you are old; and if you are old, rest assured that it will send you gently and happily down the stream of human time to eternity. You send one person, only one, happily through the day; that is, three hundred and sixty-five in the course of year; and suppose you live only forty years after you commence this course, you have made fourteen thousand six hundred human beings, at all events, happy for a time. Now, worthy reader, is not this simple? And is it not worth accomplishing? We do not often indulge in a moral dose—but we feel warranted in prescribing. It is most excellent for digestion, and a producer of pleasant sleep.—Scientific American.

A PORTRAIT OF AN ANTI-BOOK FARMER.—He plows three inches deep, lest he should turn up the poison that, in his estimation lies below; his wheat land is plowed so as to keep as much water on it as possible; he sows two bushels to the acre and reaps ten, so that it takes a fifth of his crop to seed his ground; his corn land never had any help from him, but bears just what it pleases, which is from thirty to thirty-five bushels by measurement, though he brags that it is fifty or sixty. His hogs if not remarkable for fattening qualities, would beat old Eclipse at a quarter race; and was the man not prejudiced against deep plowing, his hogs would work the ground better with their prodigious snouts, than he does with his jack-knife-plow. His meadow lands yields three-quarters of a ton to a whole ton of hay; which is regularly spoiled in curing: regularly left out for a month—regularly stacked up and left for the cattle to pull out at their leisure, and half eaten and half trampled under foot. His horses would excite the avarice of an anatomist in search of osteological specimens; and returning from their range of pasture they are walking herbariums, bearing specimens in their mane and tail of every weed that bears a burr or cockle. But oh! the cows, if held up in a bright day to the sun, don't you think they would be semi-transparent? But he tells us good milkers are always poor! His cows get what Providence sends them, and very little besides, excepted in winter, then they have half a peck of corn, the ears a foot long, thrown to them, and they afford lively spectacles of animated corn and cob crushers; never mind, they yield on an average three quarts of milk per day! and that milk yields varieties of butter quite astonishing!

WOOL.—The Governor of R. I. has received a communication from Mr. BURKE, accompanied with eighteen specimens of the finest wools of Europe, very carefully selected from the most valuable fleeces of Silesia, Saxony, &c., by a gentleman formerly employed in the Patent Office, and of which mention is made in the Patent Office Report of 1847. Mr. BURKE says that these specimens are unquestionably superior to any ever brought to this country, and are designed to serve as a standard to the wool growers of the United States. Accompanying the specimens is a catalogue, enumerating the various fleeces from which they were taken.

☞ It has been discovered that Dumas, the Mulatto novelist of France, has stolen the works of 75 different authors, and translations, and has published them as his own. Of the 45 dramas of which he claims to have been the author, only four were written by him without assistance.

AN EDITOR IN LUCK.—We see by the marriage lists in our New Hampshire exchanges that JOHN S. WALKER, Esq., editor of the Claremont Eagle, was lately married to HARRIET H. daughter of the late George B. Upham, of Claremont. The bride brings to her husband as a dowry the nice little sum of $500,000, left her by her father.

Now that we have acquired some 800,000 square miles of territory by the treaty with Mexico, it may not be amiss to know what are some of its natural treasures. Sonora, produces gold, silver and pearls; New Mexico and Santa Fe, gold, silver and iron; and Upper California, corn, wine and pearls. Quicksilver is also found in abundance in Upper California. We have seen a specimen of quicksilver ore taken from the mine of Santa Clara, near the Puebla de San Jose de Guadalupe, only six miles from steamboat communication on San Francisco Bay. The ore is exceedingly pure and rich, and is extensively used in the silver mines of Western Mexico.

The Santa Clara mine is owned by a company in Tepic, Mexico, and two other veins have been opened by Americans, near San Francisco, and from appearances, the supply of California quicksilver, when developed by Yankee enterprise, will be inexhaustible, considering the acquisition of the balance of Mexico, sooner or later as our inevitable destiny, the value of these quicksilver mines cannot be too highly estimated. Yankee enterprise, too, will soon unbury the gold, silver and iron ores that lie hidden in the mountains of Sonora, New Mexico, and Santa Fe. Before a generation passes, the iron ore will be rolled into bars and laid on rail-tracks, and moulded into locomotives that will go thundering over that vast expanse of country, frightening the wild beasts from their haunts, and bearing the fruits of American enterprise from ocean to ocean.

The vine grows luxuriantly in California, and a few years hence will see our vineyards there, rivalling those of Burgundy and the Rhine. California also produces all the staple grains, and for horse and cattle raising is unrivalled. It has an unlimited supply of choice timber, a luxury denied to many portions of Mexico. The pearl fisheries on the coast, once a rich source of revenue to the Spaniards, though long since abandoned by that indolent people, will be speedily revived by our adventurous divers, who plunge alike into earth and ocean where there are treasures to be drawn up.

The climate of the country is fine, and will of course be still improved by the clearing up of the wilderness. This new territory will not be left long in its present state. The slow-moving Castilians will soon learn from our enterprise, as emigration swarms westward, that they have been sleeping for the last century. We have got the territory, and as it is worth looking to, let us be up and at it.—N. Y. Sun.

A YANKEE IN PARIS.—Among the combatants of the three days on the popular side, was a Western Yankee who fought on one of the barricades, showing Johnny Crapeau "how Kentuckians drop 'em."

"This here shooting-iron ain't worth a darn," said he to his comrade. "If I had one of Weasons, I'd show 'em how to centre 'em."

At this moment a Frenchman came up and asked for a musket.

"We haint got none to spare," said the Yankee. "But just hold on a shake, and I'll manage it.—Look at that ere grenadier that is pointing his old roarer at me. Perhaps he couldn't hit a barn if he tried."

Bang went the Yankee's musket and down went the grenadier. Leaping down from the barricade he picked up the musket of the fallen man—handed it to the new comer, and then went on loading and firing as cooly as ever, shouting ever and anon—Veeve lay Raypublic.

THE HYENA.—Mr. Bruce says that the hyenas in Abyssinia are very numerous, and so bold that they come into the streets of the cities. From evening till towards morning they go howling about, and seeking the carcasses of dead animals. —Mr. Bruce had several armed men with him, when he was obliged to walk in the evening, and very often they had to stop, and kill one or more of these animals in their own defence. One night while he was very busy, he thought he heard something pass behind him towards his bed, but on looking around saw nothing. Having finished what he was about, he went out for a few minutes, and on his return was met with a pair of large, blue eyes, glaring at him at the dark. When a light was brought, he found a hyena standing near the head of his bed, with two or three bunches of candles in his mouth.—Mr. Bruce struck him with a pike or spear, on which the creature dropped his candles, and attacked him with the greatest ferocity. His servant coming in at this moment the fierce beast was despatched without his doing further mischief. This hyena had stolen into Mr. Bruce's room, while his door happened to be open, and had hid himself behind his bed, to wait for an opportunity of stealing and running away with his candles, which he had smelled.

Dr. Sparman tells a curious story of a hyena which was told him at the Cape of Good Hope.—One night the soldiers had a feast near the Cape, when one of them, who was a trumpeter, drank so much that he could not stand up. His companions not wanting him in the room with them, carried him out of doors and laid him down by the side of the house, to get cool and sober. The trumpeter laid there, and went to sleep, when a hyena came along, and thinking him dead began to carry him away, so as to make a meal of him without being disturbed. It was some time before the man awoke, so as to know the danger of his situation. When he did so, he found himself on the back of the hyena, who was making off toward the mountain with him as fast as possible. —Being horror-struck at finding himself in the power of the ferocious beast, his fear brought him to his senses, and seizing his trumpet, which hung about his neck, he sounded an alarm. The beast thinking he had only a dead man, was as much frightened at the sound of the trumpet, as the man was at his situation, so that dropping his prey, they scampered away from each other as fast as possible. It is not probable that any other man, but a trumpeter, would have escaped so easily.

SAGACITY OF SWALLOWS.—A French writer records the following singular fact, illustrating the intelligence of the feathered tribe:

"A swallow had slipped its foot into the noose of a cord attached to a spout in the College des Quatre Nations at Paris, and by endeavoring to escape had drawn the knot tight. Its strength being exhausted in vain attempts to fly, it uttered piteous cries, which assembled a vast flock of other swallows from the large basin between the Tuileries and Pont Neuf. They seemed to crowd and consult together for a little while, and then one of them darted at the string, and struck at it with his beak as he flew past; and others following in quick succession did the same, striking at the same part, till, after continuing this combined operation for half an hour, they succeeded in severing the cord, and freeing their companion.—They all continued hovering and flocking till night; only, instead of the tumult and agitation in which they had been at their first assembling, they were chattering as if without any anxiety at all, but conscious of having succeeded.

GOOD FARMING.—Here is the secret of good farming. You cannot take from the land more than you restore to it, in some shape or other, without ruining it, and so destroying your capital. Different soils may require different modes of treatment and cropping, but in every variety of soil these are the golden rules to attend to: Drain until you find that the water that falls from heaven does not stagnate in the soil, but runs through it and off of it freely. Turn up the land until your your plow sinks into a loose powdery loam, that the sun and air can readily pass through. Let no weed occupy the place where a useful plant could possibly grow. Collect every particle of manure that you can. Put in your crops in that course which experience has shown to lead to success in their growth, and to an enrichment and not impoverishment of the land. Give every plant room to spread its roots in the soil, and leaves in the air. And in all your operations, endeavor or to be a little ahead of your neighbors.—Temperance Star.

THE BEAR AND THE TEA KETTLE.—The bears of the Kamschatka live chiefly on fish, which they procure for themselves from the rivers. A few years ago the fish became very scarce. Emboldened by the famine and consequent hunger, the bears, instead of retiring to their dens, wandered about, and sometimes entered the villages. On a certain occasion one of them found the outer door of a house open, and entered it; the gate accidentally closed after him. The woman of the house had just placed a kettle of boiling water in the court. Bruin smelt it, but burnt his nose.—Provoked at the pain, he vented all his fury on the tea kettle. He folded his arms around it, pressed it with his whole strength to crush it; but this of course only burnt him the more. The horrible growling which the rage and pain forced from the poor animal now brought the neighbors to the spot, and Bruin, by a few shots, was put out of his misery. To this day, however, whenever any body injures himself by his own violence, the people of the village call him the "bear and the tea kettle."—Galt Reporter.

BRINGING THE CASE HOME.—A few days ago, a wag, meeting a peasant who was on his way to Bordeaux on business, said to him, "What are you doing here? They are about to divide all the land of the rich, and you had better go to the Mayor, and put down your name for your share." The peasant set off at full gallop, and on arriving at the Mayor's said "Monsieur le Maire, as there is to be a division of the land, I wish to have the meadow of M——, which joins my garden. Put down my name at the head of the list." The Mayor turned over some papers and then said: "You are not the first; I have had an applicant who demands the meadow, and also your garden with it." "My garden! my garden!" said the peasant in a fury; "I will go and get my musket;" and he set to watching his garden day and night. There is a host of persons like this peasant; they wish to share the property of others and keep their own.—Gazette de France.

FACTS ABOUT DIGESTION.—Wheat is most nutritious of all substances except oil; containing ninety-five parts of nutriment to five of waste matter. Dry peas, nuts and barley are nearly as nutritious as wheat. Garden vegetables stand lowest on the list, inasmuch as they contain, when fresh, a large portion of water. The quantity of waste matter is more than eight-tenths of the whole. Veal is the most nutritious, then fowls, then beef, last pork. The most nutritious fruits are plums, grapes, apricots, peaches, gooseberries and melons. Of all the articles of food, boiled rice is digested in the shortest time—an hour.—

As it also contains eight-tenths of nutritious matter, it is a valuable substance of diet. Tripe and pig's feet are digested almost as rapidly. Apples, if sweet and ripe, are next in order. Venison is digested almost as soon as apples. Roasted potatos are digested in half the time required by the same vegetable boiled, which occupy three hours and a half—more than beef or mutton. Bread occupies three hours and a half—an hour more than is required by the same article raw. Turkey and goose are converted in two hours and a half—an hour and a half sooner than chicken. Roasted veal and pork, and salted beef occupy five hours and a half—the longest of all articles food. Amer. Jour. of Agriculture and Science.

Willis on Philadelphia.—N. P. Willis having been ill for some time, has been ordered to Philadelphia for "change of air." In a letter to the Home Journal, written at Jones' Hotel, he thus speaks of that city:

"Philadelphia is a buxom looking town. It has a full breasted, self contented, trim and tidy expression, very different from rich and reprobate looking New York. The omnibusses here go decently, and slowly. The citizens are seen standing still, and conversing leisurely, all up and down the well-washed side walks. It is a city without a hurry. There is a municipal something to spare in the aspect of its expenditures of life and time. That the Philadelphians "get run over" oftener than the people of other cities, when they come to New York, is probably a fact that has escaped attention. But they look like a charming people to live among, and I wish we could abate, to their philosophic leisureliness, some corner of our Babel. We so outrun the lubrication with our velocity there!"

Original Anecdote.—When Dick Aimz first crossed into York State from the Canada side, he took lodgings at an inn is Canandaigua. A waiting-maid sat at the table with them, and Dick spoke of her as the servant, to the no small scandal of mine host, who told him that in his house servants were called help. Very well; next morning, the whole house was alarmed by a loud shouting from Dick of "Help! help! water! water! help!" In an instant every person in the inn equal to the task rushed into Dick's room with a pail of water. "I'm much obliged to ye, to be sure," said Dick, "but there is more than I want to shave with!" "Shave with?" quoth mine host, "you called 'help!' and 'water!' and we thought the house was on fire." "Ye told me to call the servant 'help,' and do you think I would cry water when I meant fire." "Give it up," said the landlord, as he led off the line of buckets.

Accidents—Consternation.—An old gentleman tripped up yesterday, in Broadway, by stepping on the rind of a banana—his head struck a fat lady behind him, and she fell sidelong, her parasol coming down upon the back of a dog, who was immediately under the chair of an apple-woman. She started up so suddenly as to spill a glass of root beer down the bosom of a young gentleman who was drinking it, which caused him to jump backwards against a very corpulent old gentleman, who was knocked, by the concussion, into a bed of soft mortar. He was, with difficulty, released from his condition, with pockets full of the material, and as he rose up, blinded by the dirt, he thrust his head into the bowels of friend Greeley, who was coming head down, absorbed in contemplation. Although not injured, the apparel of Greeley testified that he had got Clay enough for one day,—N. Y. Star, June 14.

A Beautiful Thought.—Life is beautifully compared to a fountain fed by a thousand streams, that perish if one be dried. It is a silver cord twisted with a thousand strings, that dart asunder if one be broken. Frail and thoughtless mortals are surrounded by innumerable dangers, which make it much more strange they escape so long, than that they all perish suddenly at last. We are surrounded by accidents every day, to crush the mouldering tenements that we inhabit. The seeds of disease are planted in our constitution by nature. The earth and the astmosphere, whence we draw the breath of life is pregnant with death—health is made to operate its own distruction.—The food that nourishes contains the elements of decay; the soul that animates it by vivifying fire, tends to wear it out by its own action; death lurks in ambush among our paths. Notwithstanding this is the truth, so palpably confirmed by daily example before our eyes, how little do we lay it to heart! We see our friends and neighbors perishing among us, but how seldom does it occur to our thoughts that our knell, will perhaps give the next fruitless warning to the world.

Handel.—Playing tricks with music with numberless divisions, to the neglect of that harmony which conforms to the sense, and applies to the passions, is false taste. Handel introduced a great number of performers and more of instruments into the orchestra, and employed even drums and cannon to make a fuller chorus; which proved so much too manly for the fine gentlemen of his age, that he was obliged to remove his music into Ireland. After which they were reduced, for want of composers, to introduce the tricks and patch-work above mentioned. Driving Handel to the Hibernian shore, is referred to in the Dunciad:

Strong in new arms, lo! giant Handel stands,
Like bold Briareus, with a hundred hands;
To stir, to rouse, to shake the world he comes,
And Jove's own thunders follow Mars's drums,
Arrest him Empress! or you sleep no more—
She heard, and drove him to the Hibernian shore.

It is remarkable, that in the earlier part of his life, Pope was so very insensible ta the charms of music, that he once asked his friend Dr. Arbuthnot, who had a fine ear, "whether the rapture which the company expressed upon hearing the compositions and performances of Handel, did not proceed wholly from affectation."

What Constitutes Good Farming.—Rawstone in his remarks on "Lancashire Farming" a valuable and erudite work, says:

It may be laid down as a standing rule, and as a guide to direct us, that all good farming, the whole of that process by which bad land is to be converted into good and productive, and to be continued in that state, is composed in the three following operations of husbandry, viz:

1. To carry off all superfluous or stagnant water, by means of judicious draining.

2. To retrieve through the medium of manure, the strength and fertility which has been exhausted by cropping.

3. To extract all noxious weeds, that the strength of the manure may be thrown into the crops and not into the weeds. Every farmer who exercises his mind in the cultivation and management of his fields, will at once recognize the importance of attending to the foregoing observations. Yet obvious are the truths they inculcate, many, we fear, will fail to profit by them. Farmers need "line upon line. and precept upon precept," in these days.

European Freedom.

BY W. K. COLE.

From Norway's coast where the ocean brine
Bathes the rocks and the headlands hoar—
From the Swedish hills where the crowning pine
Looks down on the Baltic shore,
To the sunny strand of the Spanish land,
Where the golden orange glows;
Where the mountain breeze sweeps the Pyrenees,
And the Guadelquiver flows,
Heaves a throe like that of a burning mount,
Ere the lava bursts from the fiery fount.

To the Emerald Isle, where a million eyes
Are cast o'er the Western sea,
Beyond which the land of promise lies,
The land of the truly free,
There comes a voice, bidding her rejoice,
A light through the heavy grey,
Which brings a smile to the woe-worn isle,
The hope of a brighter day;
For the proudest throne of the East is cast
To the dust, and France is free at last.

Through the proud domain where the Danube rolls,
The power of the despot wanes,
And Freedom lives where the dauntless Poles
Yet dwell on the hills and plains—
The lights that shine by the Rhone and Rhine,
Now gleam on the Vistula,
And the palace wall, and the ducal hall
Are lit with a cheering ray—
Over Münich the banners of Freedom wave,
And the Lombard spurneth the name of slave.

When Nature paints with her brightest bloom,
The base of the giant pile,
Whose cratered summit so grandly looms
O'er the soft Sicilian isle—
Where the groves and vines of the Appenines
Are bathed in the mellow light,
By the silver flood where the sea queen stood,
Is dawning an era bright,
And Sicily, Italy, Venice fall
In with the march of stately Gaul.

Floriculture.

The aphis, or green fly, so destructive to the growth of Roses, Geraniums, and other tender plants, are now at work and getting to be very troublesome. A suggestion of cure would, I trust, be to many who delight to see a perfect flower, acceptable. No plant that is subjected to the attack of this insect, can develop either size or comeliness—for as the bud and shoots begin to take form, myriads of aphis swarm upon the tender and immature parts and feed upon the juices that should, and would, otherwise impart strength and vigor to the plant, checking materially the growth, and oftentimes killing it entirely.

Of the two remedies I shall mention, either is sure, and the choice lies with the convenience of the operator. Assuring them that no fear need be entertained from the application, other than from carelessness. The first is by tobacco smoking. Take an umbrella, lash or fasten to the stick an additional piece sufficient to make it five feet long, and pointed enough to readily pierce the ground. To the covering sew around a piece of yard-wide factory or other cloth, leaving enough to lap over when the ends meet, and which must be left open; attaching a few tapes to tie this opening close when in use, and you have a very convenient little tent, which by pressing the pointed stick or handle into the ground will readily support itself.

The tent can now be placed over any infested bush or shrub in the garden without in the least disturbing either flower or foliage. We will now prepare to smoke it with tobacco, which can readily be procured of damaged plug or other refuse at four or five cents per pound, if such is used have it pulled to shreds and place some fourth of a pound in a coals carrier or other suitable small utensil, with some live coals and hot ashes to gently burn it. Place this on the ground in the centre of the tent, taking care, of course, that too much heat is not emitted, the density of the smoke you need not fear. This process instantly kills the aphis and other insects, but as many will drop to the ground before inhaling a sufficient dose and there keep cool, it is desirable to spread a sheet of paper under the plant to catch all such, and otherwise destroy them. Three or four minutes is sufficient for each bush, and with assistance the tent can be removed from bush to bush throughout the garden with but little loss of the tobacco, a pound of which will suffice for forty smokes.

It will readily be perceived the advantages this mode offers for the destruction of the aphis on parlor plants which are so shockingly attacked through the growing season. A dozen or more may be placed under the tent at the same time, and thus rid of their worst enemies in a humane way. The smoke imbibed by the plants during this process, is offensive for an hour or two, but by syringing with clean water their fragrance is at once restored.

The second plan is by syringing with whale-oil soap-suds, taking care that it is not too strong. A table spoonful to a 12 quart pail of water is the dose for tender plants; for the hardier, such as fruit and forest trees, double the dose:—pour boiling water enough to mix the soap and add rain water for the ballance.

To apply this a suitable syringe is required, which the tinsmith* can readily make for a few shillings—this wise:—A tin tube of 14 or 18 inches long by 2 inches in diameter, the end to be perforated with numerous very small holes, not larger than a small pin hole; the piston to be of a strong wire, either with a handle or ring, and the suction a neatly fitted inch block, hollowed in the center, to be lapped with cotton wicking, or tow. This syringe will throw water 25 or 30 feet and will reach the highest of our shade trees for which it is peculiarly adapted. When in use for this purpose throw the water on the top and let it trickle down on the caterpillers, slugs, &c. which will destroy them by thousands at the present time: if once wet they are well cared for. A nest of a thousand were destroyed by one discharge. In using this soap for tender plants, they require to be washed with clean water in ten minutes after the application, as the cuticle of the leaf is too tender for the soap

AMERICAN HOTEL,
CLEVELAND, June 15.

MR. EDITOR—To one who has been immersed in the "prison house" of a city from the first loosening of the shackles of winter to the advent of summer, how transporting the first glimpse of a purely rural scene! It is like the sudden transit from the horrid visions of incubustic slumbers to the wakening realities of morning's dewy splendors and the young delights of invigorated limbs and elastic spirits. Throughout the timid reign of spring, retarded in her progress by the frequent revisitations of winter's sullen imps, which ever and anon laid their unseen but icy hands with chilling touch, on her budding and tender charms. I saw but little of vegetable life, save here and there a small family of flowers that peeped cautiously out at the windows of the abode of taste, or a few rows of shade trees whose every leaf seemed to quiver with fear of injury at the approach of every reckless dray; and heard no voice of nature save a solitary singer's, that now and then emptied its soul of matin thanks, responsive to the early rumble of the milkman's cart! But today, broad and velvet fields and woody dells, adorned with flowers of every hue, have been spread before me, while a full choir of forest minstrels flung their music in the balmy air, making the heavens instinct with melody, and every green leaf apparently extatic with life. O, Mr. Editor, permit me to say, through you, to the "pale-browed denizen" of Buffalo, in the language of Mrs. GRAY,

"Go forth into the country
From a world of care and guile,
Go forth to the untainted air,
And to the sunshine's open smile:
It shall clear thy clouded brow,
It shall loose the worldly coil
That binds thy heart too closely up,
Thou man of care and toil!"

"Go forth into the country,
It hath many a solemn grove
And grassy altar 'midst the hills,
Sacred to praise and love.
And while with grateful fervor
Thine eyes its glories scan,
Worship the Power that formed them all,
O holy Christian man!"

I left Buffalo on the Empire on the evening of the 13th. The wind at the time—like a few of the deck hands—was somewhat "high," and a head sea was rolling its heavy sides caressingly against the pier; and when our aquatic "monster" first pitched into the troughs, a few of the older and less supple people in the cabin, were troubled to preserve the centre of gravity. One old gentleman immediately became inspired with prophetic visions of sea sickness. He said he "hadn't rid on a steamboat only jist once before, and that was a little skipper kind of a boat on lake Seneca, for upwards of fifty years!" and, he added with ministerial gravity, "of course I'd be sicker'n a hoss!!" I wanted to ask him what steamer he rode on half a century ago, but you know my bashfulness, Mr. Editor, and so I gagged the half-born question. Meanwhile the boat wheeling into her proper course, and mounting the big waves nearly at right angles, went bravely and steadily on her way. I think, by the bye, that the Empire is the easiest running boat on these lakes. She is so long that it takes mountain waves to tip her. She had new boilers put into her last winter, by which, Capt. RANDALL says, her speed is increased, and nearly half the quantity of fuel, formerly used, is now saved. She has also been thoroughly repaired and completely refitted throughout, making her a very inviting palace to persons having occasion to cross the lakes.

Nothing new in Cleveland. There is a little extra stir today, arising from the fact that General CASS is telegraphed as being on his way from Buffalo to this place in the Hendrick Hudson, and preparations are being made to give him a salute. Handbills say that "a signal of one gun will denote the first appearance of the boat; after which a salute of thirty guns will be fired by the "Light Artillery" from the bank of the lake, as the boat approaches the harbor. The General will sup at the New England Hotel, and leave in the evening for his home, in Detroit." And furthermore the bills say not—neither do I.

Yours, &c., J. C.

THE WASHINGTON LIBRARY.—We are happy to learn that the collection of books and pamphlets, once forming a portion of General Washington's Library, and of which we gave our readers a short account a few weeks since, has been purchased by some of our citizens, and is to be presented to the Athenæum.

We understand it is the intention of the donors to publish a descriptive catalogue of the collection. It contains, in all, about 450 bound volumes, and from 800 to 1000 pamphlets, unbound, nearly all of which belonged to the Library of Washington. About 350 contain his autograph and a few notes in his hand-writing. One little book has the autograph of Washington in a rude, school boy hand, at about the age of nine years. There are several autographs, of Augustus Washington, the father of the General. of Mary, the mother, and of Martha, the wife. One book contains on the title page the autograph of Jno, Custis, (first husband of Martha) and on the next leaf that of Geo. Washington. One volume has the autograph of Thomas Jennifer, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. There are several presentation copies from eminent authors—Sir John Sinclair, Arthur Young, Ebeling, Alfieri, Jefferson, Dr. Morse and others. Ten important volumes contain the name of Richard Henry Lee, in his own handwriting.

The books possess considerable intrinsic value. A large proportion of them relate to America.—Some are privately printed tracts of great rarity and importance. But the chief value of the collection arises from its having belonged to General Washington. The real heroes of the world are few. Among them all, how many take rank of our own Washington? As years roll on, his name will shine brighter and brighter. Every relic of him will be cherished with increasing veneration. Our children, and the great and good of coming generations, will make pilgrimages to Boston to see these precious memorials of the Father of his country.—Boston Traveller.

The Honorary Degree of Doctor in Medicine was also conferred upon Dr. G. A. Rogers, of Bath, Steuben Co.; Dr. J. L. Knight, of Paris, Oneida Co.; and Dr. Jenks S. Sprague, of Otsego Co.

After the conclusion of the ceremony of conferring the degrees, Dr. Flint delivered the customary Address. It was beautiful and appropriate, and principally directed to the graduates—embracing rules for their guidance as men and as physicians—besides many valuable suggestions upon various other topics directly and incidentally relating to their profession. The services concluded with singing by the choir, prayer by the Rev. Charles Rich, of the North Presbyterian Church, and benediction by Rev. Mr. Schuyler, of St. John's.

The University is in a very flourishing condition. The number of students during the past term was 95—graduating class, as above, 32. The buildings for the accommodation of the University, corner of Main and Virginia streets, are in progress.

Attorney General—Appointment of Gov. Toucey.—We understand that Gov. Isaac Toucey of this city, has been appointed by the President to the office of Attorney General of the United States, in place of Mr. Clifford, who is now in Mexico as Peace Commissioner. The President's letter, we have been informed, tendering the appointment, was received by Gov. Toucey on Saturday last. We trust he will accept the offer. He is every way qualified for the place, and his services in the Cabinet will prove valuable to the President. Gov. Toucey stands at the very head of his profession, and there are a few abler counsellors.

Connecticut has had only one Cabinet officer, since the formation of our Government—the Hon. John M. Niles, who was appointed Postmaster General by Mr. Van Buren, and who filled the office with distinguished ability. When Mr. Granger was appointed to that honorable place, the Postmaster General was not a Cabinet officer.—Hartford Times.

☞ Old Cheese at the State Cattle Show.—In almost every previous exhibition at our State Shows, our dairy interest has been sadly neglected in paucity of old cheeses. All lovers of good cheese prefer that which has acquired an age of at least one, to that of three years. Old cheese used to be plenty in Buffalo, and was to be found on the counters of most of the principal family grocers. But since the Eastern cheesemongers have come among us the dairies have been so barely swept that few prime specimens are left to winter beyond the first year with us. As we are in the heart of perhaps the very best cheese region of the State, and our show of that staple is expected by the public to be large and varied, we trust that not only our dairymen, but that our grocers, when they have the article on hand, will preserve some fine samples for exhibition, they can as well be competitors, in the absence of the producer, as the farmers themselves. Aside from this, it will add to the interest and spirit of the Show, to which we trust all our citizens will most cheerfully do their best to contribute. Let us have at Buffalo—what we surely can have if we try—the best dairy show ever seen in the State. We can even beat the Utica Show of its twenty tons of butter and cheese if the dairymen of Erie, Chautauque, Cattaraugus and Wyoming, and the grocers of Buffalo say the word. Let them do it.

Abolition of Slavery in Connecticut.—On Thursday a bill was passed in the Assembly of Connecticut, by which all slavery is forever abolished in that State. No law completely abolishing slavery had previously existed in Connecticut, and there are at present some eight or ten slaves in the State, who by the provisions of the act are entitled to a support from their former masters.

Mortgages in New York.—By the new Code of Procedure, which goes into effect on the 1st day of July, in this State, all mortgages which have been running for twenty years or more, must be renewed. If not, it will operate as an absolute bar to the payment of the same.

☞ The venerable Gen. Pierre Van Cortlandt died at his residence in Peekskill last Tuesday, aged 86 years. The Albany Evening Journal says:

Gen. Van Cortlandt has lingered among us until almost all his compatriots had rendered their final account. His life has been honorable to himself, beneficial to society and useful to his Country. His last public service was rendered in 1840, when, as a Whig Elector of President, he voted for General Harrison.

Jumped over the Genesee Falls!—We learn, just as we are going to press, that a young man, whose name was not given us, but who was an apprentice at the furnace of Mr. William Kidd, jumped over the Falls last evening. He made the leap near the saw-mill of Seth C. Jones, Esq., and but a short distance from the spot where Sam Patch made his last famous leap.

He threatened yesterday morning to jump over the Falls, and said that if he came up alive, he would try it again on the 4th of July. One or two individuals who saw him leap, say that he rose to the top of the water, and struck out for the shore, but immediately sunk. We hear no cause assigned for the rash act.—*Rock. A PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND; comprising recollections, sketches, and reflections, made during a tour in the East. By ALPHONSE DE LAMARTINE. In two volumes. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1848.

These two volumes, written by a present member of the Provisional Government of France, a man of excellent traits and of diversified talents, will be read with profound interest by every admirer of beautiful thoughts beautifully expressed. Lamartine visited the Holy Land in 1832, while his heart was swelling with the exuberance of youthful feeling and the green fields of life were in the early June of luxuriance, freshness and beauty. A poet, an enthusiast and a religionist, he treads the sacred grounds where "the sweet singer of Israel, the first poet of sentiment, the king of Lyrics," thousands of years before, had inhaled the breath of inspiration and of sacred song; where the sandals of John the Baptist had, ages before, brushed the dew from the velvet lawns of Judea, and where the "God man" made his advent, pronounced his beatitudes, promulged his doctrines, counselled his disciples, wept over sinners and died for a revolted world:—and no wonder that the volumes before us are full of the sweets of Poetry and the balm of Truth.—A taste of the quality of the work may be had in the following extract. The writer is at Saphora—"the Saphora of holy writ, the ancient Diocle-sian of the Romans, the largest city of Palestine in the time of Herod Agrippa, after Jerusalem:—

A great number of blocks of stone, hollowed out for tombs, traced our route to the summit of the mamelon on which Saphora is situated. Arrived at the topmost height, we beheld an isolated column of granite still standing, and marking the site of a temple. Beautiful sculptured capitals were lying on the ground at the foot of this column, and immense fragments of hewn stone, removed from some great Roman monument, were scattered every where round, serving the Arabs as boundaries to their property, and extending as far as a mile from Saphora, where we stopped to halt in the middle of the day. A fountain of excellent and inexhaustible water flows herefrom, for the use of the inhabitants of two or three vallies; it is surrounded by some orchards of fig and pomegranate trees, under the shade of which we seated ourselves, and waited more than an hour before we could water our caravan—so numerous were the herds of cows and camels which the Arabian shepherds brought from all parts of the valley.—Innumerable files of cattle and black goats wound across the plain and the sides of the hill leading to Nazareth."

GEMS FROM TUPPER: consisting of extracts from Proverbial Philosophy, Thousand Lines, Hæc-tenus, etc., etc. Compiled by a Clergyman, Syracuse: Stoddard & Babcock, 1848.

We have often had occasion to speak of the poetry of Tupper. Though not the most original, it is strikingly pure in sentiment, and has a tendency to link heart to heart in the great chain of humanity. The "Gems" are just what they purport to be, and that is enough to say of them.—Here is one:

BIRTH OF A CHILD.

"Lo, Thou hast crowned me with another blessing,
Into my lot hast dropped one mercy more;
All good, all kind, all wise in Thee possessing,
My cup, O bounteous Giver, runneth o'er,
And still thy princely hand doth without ceasing pour:
For the sweet fruit of undecaying love
Clusters in beauty round my cottage door,
And this new little one, like Noah's dove,
Comes to my ark with peace and plenty for my store.
O happy home! O bright and cheerful hearth!
Look round with me, my lover, friend and wife,
On these fair faces we have lit with life,
And in the perfect blessing of their birth,
Help me to live our thanks for so much heaven on earth."

REV. PHARCELLUS CHURCH, D. D.—We regret to learn that Western New York is about to lose this able divine, and elegant writer. He has received and accepted a call from the Bowdoin Square Church Boston Mass., and will enter upon the duties of the pastorate the first of September. The Rochester American speaks of him as follows:—

Dr. Church was settled over the First Baptist Church in this city thirteen years ago the present month. During the time he has enjoyed, in an unusual degree, the confidence and esteem, not only of the society with which he has been connected, but of the community where he resides. He is highly beloved by his parishioners, and they part with him and his labors with extreme regret.

As a preacher, able and eloquent, Dr. Church takes a high rank among the clergymen of western New York. An ardent and devoted friend of education, he is ever ready to lift his voice or take up his pen, to advocate any measure that promises to further so desirable an object; and upon whatever subject he speaks or writes he treats it with an ability equalled by few. We regret in common with the community at large, the withdrawal from among us of one who is eminently qualified for usefulness in the field he has so long occupied.

EVANGELICAL BOOKS IN MEXICO.—We rejoice to learn that as soon as the labors of the soldiers under our government have ceased in Mexico, the labors of the soldiers of the Cross are demanded. Colporteurs in the employ of the American Tract Society at Tampico and Jalapa, write that the Mexicans are not only eager to obtain books, but are willing to pay for them; and even among the most abject classes there is an ability to read with the young which is surprising. At Jalapa, in the market place before the great cathedral, the colporteurs could scarcely supply the demand; even two priests bought copies of all the Spanish books they had for sale.

Difficulties among the Winnebagoes—Refusal to Emigrate.

Mr. J. B. Henion of this city has just returned from a trip to Fort Atkinson, and through him we learn, that very great opposition was manifested by the Winnebagoes to emigrating to their new home. Stormy interviews were held with their Sub-Agent, Gen. Fletcher, on Thursday and Friday of last week, and severe threats were made by the Indians, in view of force being used to compel their removal. On Saturday morning, when Mr. Henion left, the Indians had taken down nearly all their wigwams, and all the squaws and most of the male Indians had left for parts unknown. Little Hill was addressing those who remained behind. Baptise, a chief deeply hostile to removal, was just starting for the Agency, his countenance filled with indignation. Captain Morgan was apprehensive he should be compelled to send to Fort Crawford for reinforcements.—Dubuque Tribune, June 6.

From Ezekiel Dougherty, Esq., recently from Fort Atkinson, we learn, that the principal reasons of the refusal of the Winnebagoes to remove to their new home is that they have not received a certain sum of money from the government, which was promised should be paid to them before they were called upon to emigrate. It is said they offered to take even one-half the promised sum, and remove peaceably; but that was refused them. Another fact which aggravates the difficulty was that Gen. Fletcher, the Sub-Agent, had revoked the licenses of all the traders, save Mess. Rice. The Indians say the design is to fleece them unmercifully when they arrive at their new homes, and that the Sub-Agent is to participate in the profits of the operation.

Repeal of the British Navigation Laws.—The Montreal Herald gives a report, more than three columns long, of a great meeting, held in that city last Tuesday evening, of those in favor of repealing the British Navigation Laws. The ground taken in the resolutions is that, inasmuch as all protection will shortly be withdrawn from Canadian grain and flour in the British market, the repeal of the restrictive policy of the Navigation Laws, and the removal of every obstruction to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence by foreign vessels, are matters of absolute necessity to the future prosperity of Canada; and that, if these measures be not conceded, the great part of the produce of the Western States and of Canada West that has heretofore gone down the St. Lawrence, will seek a market exclusively through American ports. The proposition introduced into the Imperial Parliament by M. Labouchere to confer on the Canadian Legislature the power of regulating as it may deem best the coasting and internal trade of the Province, was warmly and gratefully applauded by the meeting. The Herald in its editorial notice of the meeting says:

It was attended by not only the principal merchants of the city, but also, at one period of the evening, by about 1,500 or 2,000 of the inhabitants. If we may be allowed to judge of the feeling entertained of these Laws, by so large a number of our citizens, we should say that there were few, if any, present who were not in favor of their immediate and total repeal.

☞ The Buffalo route between New York and Cincinnati begins more to attract public attention, as its facilities become known. The putting on to the Lake portion of it a line of first class and fast steamers this season, has done much towards recommending it to the adoption of travellers from the south and southwest. In a short time the railroad between Cincinnati and Sandusky City will be entirely completed, when the running time between the two points will be further reduced. This route is a pleasant one, as well as being one of the speediest and cheapest in the country. The Cincinnati Chronicle, is speaking of "travelling north," says:

We had letters a few days since, from a party of ladies and gentlemen who left Cincinnati two weeks since, by the railroad to Sandusky and New York. The information they communicate may be of some service to travelling community. They left Cincinnati on Tuesday at 1½ P. M., and arrived in New York on Saturday, in just four days—having slept several hours at Syracuse—making, in fact, the trip in three days and eighteen hours! The whole trip was performed by the ladies, with this unprecedented speed, as comfortably and easy, as if they were sitting in their parlors! From Cincinnati to Sandusky, the trip was made in 16 hours, 14 miles being by stage. From Sandusky to Buffalo was 22 hours, in the fine and pleasant boat Saratoga—one of the new line from Sandusky to Buffalo. From Buffalo to Albany was by Railroad—22 hours travelling time—the party, however, stopping a few hours at Syracuse. From Albany to New York, they went in the Oregon—one of the most splendid boats in the world.

Thus did this party travel one thousand miles in less than four days, and the whole trip was one of perfect pleasure! Such is the wonderful change which a few years have wrought in the means and comforts of travelling. One can go from Cincinnati to New York in less time than he could go to Columbus, in our boyhood. Nor is this all—the trip from Cincinnati to New York will be made before the summer is out, in three days.

In 1830, returning from the East, we said that it took ten days, with great exertion, to get to New York; but the time was not very far off, when it would be made in three days. Our calculation was to travel on Railroads, at 15 miles average per hour. This is just about the present average of our Railroads; but it is obvious that the speed on Railroads may be much greater than this, with safety. We do not, however, need any increase of speed, till American Railrodds are made on more solid foundations

An Extensive and Successful Forgery.—On Sunday forenoon, a forged check for $3,993, purporting to be signed by J. N. Fiske, was presented by a boy and paid at the Hamilton Bank.—The bills paid out on it were seven $500's and three $100's, and the remainder small, all on the H. Bank.

In the course of Saturday afternoon it was ascertained that the check was presented by John P. Banchor, a boy about 14 years of age, son of Mr. Banchor, No. 3 Chatham street. While he was standing near the entrance of Quincy Hall, a well dressed business looking man came up to him in a hurried manner, and asked him if he would go on an errand for him to the Hamilton Bank for a quarter of a dollar. The boy assented, the stranger gave him the forged check, and, the errand having been accomplished, paid the quarter, took the roll of bills, rammed them into a large black wallet, and sloped. The boy, supposing that all was right, told his companions and also his mother how easily he had earned his quarter. —Boston Post.

Further by the America.

The Steamship America arrived at Boston on Tuesday evening from Liverpool which port she left on the 3d inst., having made the passage from Liverpool to Boston, including 8 hours' detention at Halifax, in the space of 10 days and 8 hours, a shorter voyage than has ever before been made by a steamship.

IRELAND.

On Saturday last, in Dublin, Mr. Mitchel, convicted of treason upon the previous evening, was sentenced to 14 years transportation, and immediately removed under an escort squadron of cavalry to a steamer of war, which was in waiting to convey him to the convict depot, at Spike Island, in the Cove of Cork. His destination is Bermuda, whither he has already sailed, to be incarcerated on board a dock yard hulk. Intense excitement prevailed in Dublin, up to Sunday night, but has since given way to a deep and solemn silence, which denotes stern preparation and resolve. A liberal provision will be made by the nation for the convict's family.

The European Times says:—When the verdict of guilty against Mr. Mitchel was delivered, a scene of great confusion ensued in the court, but the tranquility of the city of Dublin, was not materially disturbed.

On the following day, the 27th ult., Mr. Mitchel was brought up for sentence, and after some speeches, equally defiant as his previous conduct, of all authority whatsoever, he was sentenced by the court to 14 years' transportation. On the same day, he was conveyed, in the ordinary prison van, to a government steamer lying close to the quay.

By a vote of the Repeal Association, the wife and children of Mr. Mitchel are to be adopted by the people of Ireland, and their comfort and education provided for at the public expense, out of a subscription to be raised for the purpose.

The types of the United Irishman newspaper were immediately seized by the government, and his property sequestered. That paper is accordingly at an end, but arrangements are in progress for bringing out a new journal, of a similar tendency, under the sovereign style, title and dignity of the Irish Felon.

The language of Mr. John O'Connell, at the Repeal Association, when urging the members to adopt the family of Mitchel, and in expressing indignation against the Attorney General, was particularly exciting. He called upon all Irishmen never again to speak to the Attorney General, but to spit upon him as he had spit upon the Catholics—not to expose themselves to be struck down singly, but to band themselves together as determined and united Irishmen.

Mr. Mitchel arrived at Spike Island, Cork, on Sunday night, and was instantly handed over to the governor. He will immediately assume the convict dress, and be treated in every respect like an ordinary convict.

From the declaration of Sir George Grey, in the House of Commons, it appears that the government has determined on carrying out the sentence against him of transportation beyond the seas. In consequence, however, of the bad state of health under which the unfortunate man is suffering, they have relinquished the intention of sending him to Norfolk Island, but have ordered him to be conveyed to her Majesty's dock yard at Bermuda, and there, on board the Thames convict hulk, to undergo his first year's sentence.

H. B. steam sloop Scourge, of six guns, Com. Wingrove, left Portsmouth on Monday morning for Cork, to take on board the unhappy Mr. Mitchel, and other prisoners, and proceeded immediately to Bermuda.

CHARTIST MOVEMENTS.

Some partial disturbances have taken place in London, at Bradford, Manchester, Leeds, and other places. Chartists have been the chief instigators of these tumults, which in every case have been almost instantly suppressed.

On Monday evening a large assemblage of Chartists collected at Clerkenwell, in London, but at midnight they dispersed On Wednesday evening similar meetings took place, but the arrangements of the police, aided by a demonstration of the military, were so complete, that the mob, whenever it appeared, was speedily scattered.

The special force was called out to guard the outskirts, and the same alacrity in turning out to preserve order and property was exhibited by the middle classes as on the 10th of April.

At Bradford, a collision took place between the Chartists and the police, and a great riot ensued; but the military restored order, and enabled the police to capture the principal ringleades, many of whom have been committed for trial at Manchester.

After various meetings of confederated clubs and Chartists, a great meeting was organized, to be held on Wednesday, comprising large bodies from the surrounding districts, but the magistrates issued a proclamation forbidding it. They also prevented the Oldham Chartists from entering Manchester. A large body of military and police were drawn up, and the multitude was compelled to retreat.

FRANCE.

During the past week tranquility has been maintained in Paris, under the vigorous administration of Gen. Cavaignac, with a large body of regular troops under his command. The attempts which have been several times made to create disturbance have been at once suppressed.

The National Assembly, surrounded by an immense military force, sits daily, and appears by degrees settling down to the business of practical legislation.

The determination of the Assembly and the Executive to break up the system of organization of labor, set on foot by M. Louis Blac, has occasioned deep resentment among the receipts of the wages of the state. The exccutive first struck a blow at the directors of the ouvriers, M. Emile Thomas, who succeeded M. Louis Blanc in the administration of the atelliers nationaux.

On the night of the 26th ult., M. Emline Thomas was suddenly sent for by a Minister of Public work, and superseded in his office by two civil engineers, and having been compelled to sign a resignation, was sent off in the custody of two agents of police, to Bordeaux, or the neighborhood.

The workmen demanded the reinstatement of M. Emile Thomas in his functions, and since that time the rappel has been beaten almost daily.

Large assemblages of workmen have been drawn together in various parts of Paris, but being kept in check by the overwhelming force both of regular troops and National Guards brought them, all the efforts to disturb the peace, have been abortive. The persons actually receiving the wages of the State cannot be fewer than 120,000. It is intended to draft a portion of these into the provinces, and thus break up the confederacy.

The police have at length succeeded in capturing the redoubtable Blanqui, and also Flotte.

The relations between the executive and the Assembly are at length setled. The members of the executive must attend the Assembly when forty members require it. They have, however, a special right to be heard, but they are exempt from general attendance.

It is stated that the committee appointed to draw up a constitution has decided unanimously upon the expediency of having but one Chamber and a single President, both the result of direct popular elections by universal suffrage. The number of members to the Chamber is undecided, but it is said that the present will be incapable of re-election and must have at least two millions of votes. The committee will probably conclude its labors in about three weeks.

There can be no doubt, whatever, that the complicity of Louis Blanc in the conspiracy of 15th May, has been established in evidence before the Minister of Justice and Attorney General. These authorities have demanded of the Chamber the liberty to prosecute him, and in spite of the alleged opposition of the executive authority, a committee has been appointed to report on the case. The Chamber has been thrown into great confusion by this proceeding. It appears that Louis Blanc, Barbes, and Soubrier, breakfasted together on the morning of the 15th, and together concerted their measures. The two latter are fast confined in Vincennes, while M. Louis Blanc, after several days' absence from the Assembly, has again ventured to show his face there. Can the conspirators of the 15th May really be brought to punishment under such circumstances? The decision of the committee, on Louis Blanc's case, will disclose whether the Assembly is sufficiently strong to exercise a just vigor.

It is stated that M. de Circourt has been appointed Minister to the United States.

A committee of eighteen, one for each bureau, had been appointed to consider the propriety of impeaching Louis Blanc. The prosecution is looked upon with disfavor.

INTELLIGENCE FROM THE CONTINENT.

Continental news is rather less warlike.

Prussia has discovered that the occupation of Jutland could not be tolerated, and she has withdrawn her troops. A violent street riot, arising out of the disputes so frequent in that city, arose in Berlin on the 25th. The National Guard charged the people, and a good many were hurt. Order was not restored until an early hour of the next morning.

A letter from Trent states that a sharp action between the regular troops of the Milanese and some Austrian regiments, assisted by irregular corps, had taken place near the Lake of Idro, in which the latter were victorious, having taken Caffaro, a strong post called Castel Lodrone, and repulsed the Italians as far as Rocca d'Anfo.

The Schleswig Holstein journal, under date of May 29th, announced that a collision had taken place between the Danes and the Germans, at Sunderlirtt. The Danes landed on the main land and attacked the advanced posts of the German army under the heights of Dupeller, while a number of gun boats assailed the Germans in another quarter. Large numbers were stated to have been killed and wounded on both sides: and at 7 o'clock in the evening, the Germans retreated by Gravenstein, the Danes advancing after them.—About 7,000 were engaged on each side.

It is reported that the Germans lost 1,000 men and 6 pieces of cannon. It is stated that a combined Russian, Swedish and Danish fleet was off Copenhagen, Prince Constantine being on board.

THE FATAL LEAP.—Efforts were made during the whole of yesterday to recover the body of the young man who leaped from the top of the Falls the day before. But up to the last accounts it had not been discovered. It appears that Middlebrook had made this daring leap for the mere purpose of showing his courage, in the belief that if successful in the first attempt he would be able to realize something from it hereafter, out of the curiosity of the public. The most singular fact about it is, that he was totally unable to swim, and had made an arrangement with some of his shopmates to help him out of the water below. He could not be persuaded to abandom the attempt which has cost him life, having full confidence in the motto of Sam Patch, that "some things can be done as well as others." He was very respectably connected in this city.—Rock. Dem.

NEW BUFFALO.—Last week we took a peep into New Buffalo, and was both surprised and gratified to see the marks of substantial improvement now progressing in and about that place. The building of a harbor, and the grading of the Central Railroad by the Company, seems to have given them a "jog along," beyond the most sanguine expectations of anybody. Buildings, consisting of stores, public houses and dwellings, have been put up, and ard now in the course of construction, which would do credit to any of the neighboring towns in the surrounding country.—The population is said to nearly equal that of their immediate neighbor, Michigan City.

In the construction of the harbor, there are two pile drivers at work, one propelled by steam and the other by horse power. The piers have been extended out into the lake several hundred feet, and are to be extended some six hundred feet further, which, by being encircled by a breakwater, will complete a good and safe harbor.—Niles Intelligencer.

FROM THE WEST INDIES.—We have Kingston papers to the 15th of May, inclusive—not so late as advices recevied via New Orleans, yet affording materials for a paragraph or two.

The principal topic of discussion is the financial and commercial condition of the several islands, which is the theme of general complaint, as it has been for some time past. The Legislatures of the several islands were devising ways and means to meet the deficit of revenue, and at St. Vincent an extraordinary meeting of the Assembly had been called. In consequence of a premature adjournment caused by the absence of members, whose neglect of their public duties is specifically rebuked by the Governor in his opening address.

The American brig Draco, from Port au Prince, which arrived at Kingston on the 12th of May, had on board twelve families, the heads of which had been proscribed by the Haytien Government as traitors, and ordered to leave immediately on peril of their lives.

At Antigua the planters are making strenuous efforts to meet the difficulties of their position by reducing wages and other expenses; and they call upon the merchants and ship owners in England to make corresponding reductions in their charges—hope of restored protection against slave labor competition being abandoned.—N. Y. Adv. of the 12th.

THE VETERANS PASSING AWAY.—We are pained to announce that our respected fellow citizen, Mr. Alexander Ely, died yesterday morning, aged 86 years. He was a native of West Springfield, Mass., and came to this city in 1816, and has resided here ever since. He was in the war of the Revolution, and was present at the execution of Major Andre. He was highly esteemed by all who knew him. The venerable spirits of the Revolution are indeed rapidly passing away.—Rock. Adv.

The Slaughter at Naples.

A London letter mentions that two thousand lives were lost at Naples in the outbreak of May 15. The correspondent of the London Daily News gives a narrative of the events of the day, which we abridge:

Every hour seems to show the greater magnitude of the loss of life on Monday, the 15th, and the horrors connected with it. Enough I have seen to enable me to speak of this terrible disaster as the greatest which has befallen any city in modern times, whether as regards the carnage or the destruction of property. Upwards of 2,000 persons sacrificed! Such is the enormous loss in which all seem now to agree. I went last night to inquire, for a gentleman who resides near me, Melga, proprietor of the Crocelle, in Chiatamine, and found that he had been shot on Monday and buried the same night, tossed into a pit with hundreds of others, and lime thrown upon them.

I met a person who, being at Campo Santo, had seen seven bodies, all of one family, brought in; they were found in a well, and were supposed to have been thrown in, or else to have thrown themselves in to avoid the soldiery. The common voice goes on to speak of women and children being shot as well as men, or placed on their knees in momentary expectation of death while their houses were rifled of everything. So late as Wednesday afternoon I was again wandering through this city of sorrow, and I passed down Santa Brussiva. Near the church was assembled a crowd, horror-struck and silent. There had been a little rain, which had disturbed the rubbush, and men were called in to wash down the steps and street, which was running down a river of blood and water.

Here there had been great carnage; on this spot poor Melga and three others had been shot; in the next house, on the ground floor alone, as many more had been hacked to pieces by the soldiery, who had broken through at the back of the church to get at them. Take these as feeble descriptions of a thousand similar horrors. The aspect of the city is beyond conception sad; this usually gay and cheerful city is now comparatively deserted, houses burned, ruined or robbed; shops generally shut. Most have fled. The houses in the suburbs are filled by poor families, who are too happy to have escaped with their lives. —Very many are clad in recent mourning, and all are agitated by a hundred rumors which point to some approaching and more terrible disaster.—God preserve us from it!

One of the most disgraceful features of this affair has been the plunder on the part of the soldiery and the lazzaroni. This is an undoubted fact: I saw them running by my house with the most valuable articles for two days and a night, exulting over what they deemed their lawful robbery, and shouting "Viva il Re!" It is said they were encouraged to rob by the soldiers; certainly they were not prevented; and that day and the day after it is equally certain that a piastre a-piece was distributed to them. There was a general fraternization between the soldiers and the mob.

The burning rage against the Swiss soldiers is intense; and aasassination will take off many.—The night before last several were murdered; yesterday morning more than one was shot, from whence or by whom no one knows. It must have been by fulminating cotton. One poor fellow was borne by me on a stretcher as I was walking in the Toledo. Later in the day a druggist told me that for three days a young man had been to purchase a pound of fulminating cotton, but that he had refused it, suspecting something wrong. These acts do not increase in us a sense of security.

The King has pardoned all the prisoners taken for the act of Monday, many of whom were taken in arms, and some of whom had cannon in their palaces. Prince Cirella and his sons were the first that were liberated. I was present on Thursday evening in a large crowd watching them as they were let out. Some were wounded; others without hats and half-dressed.

Every order of government, I see, is signed by Labrano, Governor of Naples, the city being in a state of siege. The theatres are to be opened at his discretion. All crowds in the streets are to be dispersed by the soldiery. Except the official journal, nothing has been sold or printed since Monday.

The official journal of late last night has the following orders for the military governor of Naples:

It is forbidden to editors and printers to print placards and journals to be sold in the capital.—Such an order to hold good until government shall publish some regulations on the subject—regulations, however, which will speedily be published.

Banishment of George Sand.—The celebrated George Sand has received a hint that her farther presence in Paris at the present moment might be attended with disagreeable consequences, and she has consequently retired to some quiet spot at a distance from Paris. It appears that she was one of the depositories of the secret of the attempt on the National Assembly on the 15th ult. and one of the principal actors in carrying it into execution. During the attack upon the Assembly she was seen at a small public house at the corner of the Rue de Bourgogne, in company with M. Boccage, and actor at one of the Paris theatres, distributing pistols, daggers, and other weapons, to the persons forming the procession, at the very moment when they were approaching the hall of the Assembly.

The fact was brought to the knowledge of the Attorney General of the Republic, who, on inquiry found the facts to be so well authenticated, that he felt he could not pass the matter over in silence, and he therefore gave the fair conspirator a hint, which has had the effect of driving her into retirement. George Sand, or rather Madame Dudevant, is an intimate friend of M. Ledru Rollin, and she is suspected of having given M. Jules Favre considerable assistance in framing the celebrated bulletins of the Republic. On the day of the election of the Executive Governmen, which has replaced the Provisional Government, Georges Sand was at the National Assembly, and while the ballot for the members of the Executive Government was going on, the National Guards on duty were not a little astonished to see her sitting on the grass with M. Ledru Rollin, in the little garden adjoining the Salle des Pas Pendus, coolly smoking cigars.

Melencholy Suicide.—We are called upon to record a melancholy act of suicide. Mr. John Rogers, of this city, about 23 years of age, a tinner by occupation, in the employ of Mr. Sandford, was found hanging by the neck dead, at about noon this day, in his room at the Franklin House. His shirt was tied about his neck and a rope fastened to it and suspended upon a nail over the door. He was down after dinner yesterday, and was not seen from then until he was found in the situation mentioned. He was a young man of good character, and no cause can be assigned for the melancholy act. It is supposed that he is the person who wished to borrow a pistol of Mr. James, gunsmith, yesterday. A dirk or large knife was found in his room. His friends reside in Brooklyn.—Utica Observer.

A GENTLEMAN.—Did you ever see a gentleman? We have seen two or three in our day, but real gentlemen are exceedingly rare. A gentleman is one who treats every body with respect, whether he be black or white, low or high, poor or rich.—He does not bow to wealth, scrape his knees to honor, nor hold his tongue when he sees wickedness in high places. You always receive from him a civil answer to your inquiry, and he kindly imparts to you any information in his power. He will not say a word to injure your feelings, or allude to a subject to pain your heart Whatever may be done, he will not manifest angry feelings, or use unbecoming language. He uses no profane or indecent words; smokes no cigars in your presence, nor spits tobacco juice on your floors.—He is the same kind and accommodating individual from one week's end to another.—Portland Umpire.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.—The following Missionaries were to sail from Providence on Tuesday, for Africa, in the brig Smithfield, Captain DUFF, bound for Cahoon River: Rev. J. L. WILSON and wife; Rev. A. BUSHNELL and wife; Rev. J. M. PRESTON and wife; Rev. W. T WHEELER; Mrs. GRISWOLD; also, JOHN WESLEY, a native youth, who came to the United States two years since, and has learned the art of printing.

QUICK WORK.—The Niagara left Boston Wednesday afternoon for Liverpool, and carried out answers to letters received by the America.—The letters by the latter will be received in England in very little more than three weeks from the hour of despatching those to which they are replies. Captain Ryrie, we see by the Boston papers, expresses his belief that, with moderate weather, he shall make the passage home in ten days. The America came over in ten days and eight hours.

A LUMP OF SILVER.—A cake of Native Silver dug from the works of the Lake Superior Company, bed of Eagle river, has just been assayed at the U. S. Mint, with the following results:

Weight—6 lbs. 10 oz., avordupois.

Assay—95 per ct., Silver; 5 per ct., earthy matter.

Value—$118,57, hard money.

A pocket full of such rocks wouldn't be bad.

TO COOK PARSNIPS.—Persons who have never eaten parsnips cooked according to the following mode, have no idea what an excellent dish they are. Scrape the parsnips, wash and slice them lengthwise; boil in just enough water to cover them till thoroughly done, Then put in a piece of butter, with a little salt and pepper. Beat up an egg with a spoonful of flour, and pour over them. They are then ready to dish up. Parsnips are likewise very good, split once and roasted with pork in the dripping pan.—S. Planter.

The body of Hosea Middlebrook, who jumped the Genesee Falls last Thursday evening, was discovered about two o'clock yesterday afternoon near the spot where he struck the water, by two young men who were bathing. An inquest was held on the body by Coroner Frost.—Roch. Amer.

A Tale of Italy.

BY MARIANNA HENDER.

The last low peal of the Convent bell
Was murmuring faintly by,
As a maiden knelt in a vine-wreathed bower,
'Neath the blue Italian sky.
But that vesper-calm shed no breath of balm
O'er the fevered pulse and brain—
While the storm-gust caught from her spirit, wrought
In a deep, impassioned strain!

"Ah! little reck they, the glad and gay,
As they chide the tears that start,
Of the weary woe that hath folded slow
Round my crushed and breaking heart!
Yet its burdened scroll may no hand unroll,
Nor that voiceless grief confess—
Pride brooketh no eye of sympathy
On its boarded wretchedness!

"I will mingle to-night, in the revel bright,
With a proud, imperial brow—
And mine eye shall beam as it ne'er were dim
In tears o'er the false one's vow!
Hope's mantling blush shall my pale cheek flush,
And my sad lip wear the smile,
That it brightly bore, in those days of yore
Ere the soul had dreamed of guile!

"Fair gems shall rest on my heaving breast,
Though they lift to the heart-throb there!
And orient pearls, mid my clustering curls,
Shall a softened radiance wear.
But starry streams from these burning gems
O'er a cold, cold heart shall flow,
Like the faithless play of the meteor-ray
That flasheth o'er polar snow!

"A measure I'll trace in the dance's maze,
With a calm and queenly air;
But my heart I'll veil from the mocker's gaze,
For the canker-worm wasteth there!
Yet careless words, from its shattered cords,
Shall its fainting anguish hide,
Till they marvel all, that the spirits thrall
Is so lightly cast aside!

"Glad strains shall float to the lute's soft notes,
And the harp's rich minstrelsy!
Nor voice of woe, 'mid the cadence low,
Breath a mournful melody!
Oh long, too long, to the lip of song
Hath a seal of anguish clung!
Should the proud soul pine by the broken shrine
Where its gifts were vainly flung?

"For he wearies now of his early vow,
As he seeketh a portioned bride;
While the murmured words that mine ears have heard,
Are poured at another's side!
Nay! with tearless eye will I burst each tie,
And that plighted faith restore;
But the trusting truth of my sunny youth,
Ye can give me back no more!

"For a clasping chain o'er my heart hath lain
Till each link is buried deep;
And years may roll but my silent soul
Must that searing impress keep!
I could kneel to bear e'en the death-point there,
Had another dealt the doom!
But it matters not! to his brighter lot
May no dark upbraidings come!

"I would weep to throw, round his path below,
As he walketh unscathed and free,
The withering blight that like pall of night
O'ershadoweth my destiny!
For the desert blast o'er each joy hath past,
With its hot, consuming breath;
Nor may greenness spring where its scorching wing
Hath swept with the Siroc's wrath!

"'Tis o'er! 'tis o'er!—from the dust once more
Doth my lofty spirit rise!
High anthems swell, for the victim pale
Is robed for the sacrifice!
"'Mid that pageant proud, with a soul unbowed,
Shall the scorned Bianca shine;
And the shaft may speed, but no eye shall read
That a bursting heart is mine!"

* * * * * * * * * *

'Tis night's deep noon, but the olive-gloom
Is flashed with the torches' gleams,
As the revellers steal with a merry peal,
On the fair Bianca's dreams!
"Ha! tarriest thou from the Bridal now?"
—But the sudden life that fled
From each whitening cheek might the sad tale speak,
For the gentle girl was dead!

Two Death-bed Scenes.

From the Vermont Chronicle.

"Look first on this picture; then on that."

It was a gorgeously furnished apartment in the palace of England's queen. The windows are hung with crimson velvet; the sofas and draperies are of the same rich material, tastefully arranged. Costly and beautiful paintings from the ancient masters, in massive frame decorate the walls. The last rays of the sun, breaking through the crimson curtains shed a soft and mellow light through the apartment.

Reclining upon a royal couch, a noble queen lies dying. Her countenance is severely stern, and expressive of determined resolution. That broad forehead is contracted, as if in pain. She has enjoyed all the honors this world can bestow. How worthless pleasure, wealth and renown appear, as the vista of futurity opens upon the eye of the soul. The scenes of eternity now unveil themselves to her astonished vision, and her whole preparation for that untried state is crowded into a few brief moments. Now despair is depicted in every feature; the lashings of conscience are terrible. She actually writhes under excess of mental anguish; there is an expression of awe in the countenance of every beholder, and the profound silence of terror seems to pervade the apartment. With accents faltering in death, the dying Eliza-both exclaims: "Millions of money for a moment of time." Miserable woman; she possesses wealth and fame; she is surrounded with pleasure and luxury—and yet she shrieks in vain for a moment of time. There is a groan, a spasm, and all is still, the heart has ceased its throbbing and that soul stands in the presence of Jehovah. Proudly did she rise above the great and the gifted upon the earth:

"But who would soar the solar height,
To set in such a starless night."

* * * * *

In a lowly cottage, half concealed with the overshadowing foliage resides the family of the missionary. It is a lovely morning; the birds are pouring forth their rich notes of melody; the air is perfumed with the grateful fragrance of flowers, bending, half concealed, with the abundance of dew upon them. The windows of the cottage are thrown open, and the fringed curtains looped far back to admit the fresh breeze. Although everything around seems joyous, yet there is sorrow in that dwelling; the wife and mother; the devoted missionary is dying. A smile is on her lip; in her countenance there is an unearthly beauty.—Hers has been a life of sacrifice and selfdenial in the cause of her Redeemer—she had given up the ease, pleasure and luxury of her early home to serve Christ. Now she is going to reap her reward in heaven. Death has no terror for her; serenity pervades her whole bearing as she draws near eternity. Her eyes are closed yet visions of hear early home, of childhood's joyous hours, are thronging her mind. Now she joins in the worship of God in the sanctuary, now unites in a hymn of praise; now she beholds the gates of heaven, the river of life, while earth and all its scenery grows dim about her.

Look at her again. Her face is calm, like that of an angel: those lips move not; that heart has ceased its beating.

"The gentle air
Comes through the open window freighted with
The savory odors of the early spring—
She breathes it not; the laugh of passers by Jars like a discord in some mournful tune,
But worries not her slumbers. She is dead."

Her spirit, borne on angel's wings, enters the gate of the heavenly city. The mind of man never conceived such glory as now bursts upon her enraptured vision. The ear of mortal never listened to such music as now fills her soul with melody. The imagination never conceived such happiness as now fills her whole being with delight.

"Before the throne she stands sublime in robes
Of glory; and now her fingers wake the chords
To praise; which all in heaven repeat."

Novels and Insanity.—In the fourth annual report of the Mount Hope Institution for the insane, by Dr. W. H. Stokes, he says, in respect to moral insanity, "Another fertile source of this species of derangement has appeared to be an undue indulgence in the perusal of the numerous works of fiction, with which the press is so prolific of late years, and which are sown broadcast over the land, with the effect of vitiating the taste and corrupting the morals of the young. Parents cannot too cautiously guard their young daughters against this pernicious practice. We have had several cases of moral insanity, for which no other cause could be assigned than excessive novel reading. And nothing is more likely to induce this disease than the education which fosters sentiment, instead of cherishing real feelings—such as result from the performance of active benevolence, sacred duty of ordinary life, and of religious obligations—which awakens and strengthens the imagination without warming the heart; and, to borrow the language of an eloquent divine, places the individual 'upon a romantic theatre—not upon the dust of mortal life.'"

Battle of Dunbar.

The spot on which Oliver drew up his little army, was a small, narrow, tongue of land, running out into the Frith of Forth—high and bleak near where it joined the main land, and overlooking, on either side, the restless ocean. The town of Dunbar was behind him—a single mansion, Brocksmouth House, faced his extreme left—else there was not a covering on the desolate expanse, save one hut, into which the cannon were carried to shelter them from the rain, which fell in torrents.

On this bleak and narrow peninsula, only a mile and a half wide at its base, behold the white tents of Cromwell's army! In front of him, landward, is a desolate, unpassable moor, with a low ridge of hills beyond, on which stands the Scotch army, twenty-three thousand strong. At the base of these runs a small streamlet, forty feet wide and almost as many deep; furnishing only two passes over which troops can march. Cromwell's ships are in the offing, his now last remaining resource: the lion is at length caught, and the prey deemed secure.

On the second of September, Oliver looks forth from the desolate heath, on which his army is drawn up in order of battle; and lo! what a sight meets his gaze. Behind him is the sea, swept by a strong wind; and before him, blocking him in from shore to shore, a chosen army outnumbering his own two to one. The white tents, that are sprinkled over this low peninsula, rock to and fro in the storm of sleet and hail; and darkness and gloom hang over the Puritan host. This strip of land is all that he has left in Scotland, while a powerful army stands ready to sweep him into the sea. But it is in circumstances like these that his character shines forth with greatest splendor.—Though his overthrow seems certain, he exhibits no discouragement or fear, for, "he was a strong man in the dark perils of war; in the high places of the field, hope shone in him like a pillar of fire, when it had gone out in all others."

At four o'clock that evening, as he was watching the enemy's movements through his glass, he saw that the Scotch commander was bringing down the whole army from the hill to the brook at its base, to be ready next day to commence the assault. In this movement his quick eye detected an error, which, like Bonaparte, he determined to avail himself of.

Lesley, in executing his maneuver, had packed his main body into a narrow space, where it could not easily deploy; while the entire right wing stretched into the plain. Cromwell saw, that if he could rout this wing, and roll it back in disorder on the unwieldly mass, before it could draw up in order of battle in the open ground, victory would be sure. That night, therefore, his twelve thousand men were placed in battle array, with nothing white about them to show conspicuous in the dusky twilight, and with orders, as soon as the morning dawned, to fall on the enemy. All night long, the drenched army stood, without a tent to cover them, in the cold storm; while the moan of the sea, as it rolled heavily on the beach, seemed chanting a requiem beforehand, for the dead that should cumber the field. But, amid the shriek of the blast, and the steady roar of the waves, the voice of prayer was heard along the lines; and many a brave heart, that before another night should beat no more, poured forth its earnest supplications to the God of battles.

Toward morning, the clouds broke away, and the moon shone dimly down on the silent host.—Cromwell, who had been intently watching the enemy's motions, now saw a column moving down the southern pass; and lifting up his arm, exclaimed, "the Lord hath delivered them into our hands!" The trumpets then sounded the charge—the artillery opened their fire, while louder than all rang the shouts, "The Lord of Hosts! the Lord of Hosts!" as infantry and cavalry poured in one wild torrent together on the enemy. The first division of the foot recoiled; when Cromwell ordered up his own regiment, which, with leveled pikes, pressed sternly forward amid the carnage, bearing down all opposition. At that moment, the cavalry came thundering on; the Scotch paused in terror; the next moment the clattering tempest was upon them. Over the brook and over the hostile ranks they went, trampling down the steady battalions like grass beneath their feet, and bearing three thousand souls to the next world, in their fierce passage. In the midst of this terrible charge, on which Cromwell's eye rested with the deepest anxiety, the sun rose over the naked hills, and, struggling through the mist that was gently moving away from the battle-field, sent his level beams athwart the commingled hosts.

So did the sun rise on Napoleon at Borodino, as he stood and surveyed the field on which two hundred and sixty thousand men were moving to battle, and the sublime expression burst from his lips, "Behold the Sun of Austerlitz!" But Cromwell carried way by a higher sentiment than glory, gave vent to his emotions in sublimer language.—As the blazing fire-ball rolled slowly into view and poured its light over the scene, he burst forth, "LET GOD ARISE, and let his enemies be scattered!" Ay, and they were scattered. The right wing, broken and disordered. was rolled in a confused mass upon the main body of the army; and the panic spreading, those twenty thousand men became a cloud of fugitives, sweeping hither and thither over the field. At the base of Doon Hill, on which the enemy had been encamped, Cromwell ordered a general halt: and while the horse could be rallied for the chase, bade the army sing the hundred and seventeenth Psalm "Hundred and seventeenth Psalm, at the foot of Doon Hill; there we uplift it to the tune of Bangor, or some still higher score, and roll it strong and great against the sky." As the mighty anthem died away on the field, the shout of battle was again heard; and the fierce cavalry drove amid the broken ranks, riding down the fugitives and sabring them without mercy, till the ground was covered with dead.

Three thousand were slain: and ten thousand taken prisoners; while fifteen thousand stand of arms; two hundred stands of colors, and twenty-seven cannon, remained as spoils to the victors. It was an utter rout of the Scotch; the whole country around became covered with a disorderly multitude, through which the steady squadrons of the republicans galloped without resistance.—Headley's Life of Cromwell.

TO RAISE SHEPHERD DOGS.—Take a pup of the largest cur species, from 3 to 6 weeks old, and a ewe that has a young lamb. Kill or otherwise dispose of the young lamb; confine the ewe in a small pen, and make the puppy suck the ewe three or four times and you have done all that is necessary. The puppy will recognize the ewe as its mother, the ewe will own the puppy as her offspring, and will rear it. A dog thus raised is wilder and fiercer, and much more severe in fight than the ordinary cur—able to use up all the wolves that can be produced. They in part partake of the nature of a wild animal, and will subsist like sheep upon vegetation. We have a friend in the sheep business in South America, some 20 miles back from Montevideo, who has a large number of dogs with his flock, and they afford complete protection. This is the whole secret in raising shepherd dogs.—Galena Jeffersonian.

CHURCH MUSIC.—The following extract is taken from "Ranke's History of the Popes," and will be found curious and interesting to those who delight in church music as an aid to devotion;

"With regard to one art alone, it was long doubtful whether it would lend itself entirely to the purposes of the church or not. In the middle of the sixteenth century, music had lost herself in the most intricate artificiality. The reputation of a composer rested entirely on arbitrary and difficult tricks, while the meaning of the words were wholly disregarded; there are a great number of masses of that period, which are variations on themes of some well known profane airs; the human voice was treated as a mere instrument. No wonder if the council of Trent was scandalized at the performance of such music in the churches. In consequence of its discussion, Pius IV. nominated a commission to advise upon the question, whether music was to be permitted in the churches, or not. The decision was very doubtful. The church required distinctness of words, and adaptation of musical expression to them. The musicians affirmed that this was not to be attained according to the laws of their art. Carlo Borromeo was in the commission, and severe judgment was rendered very probable by the strict opinions of this great ecclesiastic. Happily for art, the right man appeared at the critical moment. Among the composers at that time in Rome was Piero-Luigi Palestrina. The rigor of Paul IV. had driven him out of the papal chapel because he was married; from that time he had lived, secluded and forgotten, in a miserable hut among the vineyards of Monte Celio. His was a spirit that diversity could not crush. Even in this solitude he devoted himself to his art with an enthusiasm which ensured to the creative power within him, freedom and originality of production.

Here he wrote the 'Improperie,' which still yearly solemnizes Good Friday in the Sistine chapel. Never, probably, had a composer a more exquisite appreciation of the profound sentiment of his text, of its symbolical meaning, its applicability to religion, its capacity for moving the soul. If ever a man was competent to make the experiment, whether the method he had adopted could be applied to the more extended and complicated work of a mass, it was Palestrina; the commission intrusted it to him. He felt completely that it was an experiment on which depended the life or death of the grand music of the mass. He applied himself to his task with conscious tension of all his powers; on his manuscript were found the words, 'Domine illumina oculos meos!" He did not immediately succeed; the two first attempts failed; but at length, in a fortunate moment, he completed that mass, known under the name of the mass of Pope Marcellus, which surpassed all expectation. Though full of simple melody, it may be compared in variety with any preceding masses. Choruses separate, and re-unite; the meaning of the words is expressed with unrivalled force and accuracy; the Kyrie is submission; the Agnus, humility; the Credo, majesty. Pope Pius IV., before whom it was performed, was enraptured, and compared it to the heavenly melodies which the Apostle John heard in his ecstatic trance. By this one great example the question was now for ever set at rest. A path was opened, in following which the most beautiful works, the most touching, even to those who are not of the church, were produced. Who can hear them without enthusiasm? It is as if nature acquired tone and utterance; as if the elements spoke, and the voice of universal life broke forth in the spontaneous harmony of adoration; now undulating, like the waves of the sea—now mounting in songs of triumph to Heaven. This art, which had perhaps been more completely alienated, from the spirit and service of the church than any other, now became the most strongly attached to it.—Nothing could be more important to catholicism. —Even in its dogmas, it had, if we mistake not, caught somewhat of that spirit of enthusiastic reverie which pervades the most impressive penitential and devotional books. Spiritual sentimentality and rapture were the favorite themes of poetry and painting. Music, which speaks a language more direct, more impressive, more irresistible, more adapted to ideal expression, than any other expositor or any other art, became the interpreter of these emotions, and thus subjugated all minds to her empire."

THE HURRICANE.—There is a vigor and truth in the following sketch by the author of the "Owl Creek Letters":

We had a hurricane yesterday, which left the mountain side marked with the forest ruins. There is a path mowed across the whole range. It came on at about noon. A dense black cloud lay on the horizon, and came slowly up until it reached the zenith. At the instant that the black thunder had veiled the sun, I saw the trees on the opposite mountain ridge swaying and bowing before the blast. It was perfectly still and calm where we were, and not a breath moved the delicate flower of the mysotis, which bloomed at my feet as I stood on the river bank. A moan came from the storm, and I bowed my head and listened to it. At first it was but a low wail, followed by a low whisper, as if a mother had heard her waking child's cry and was stilling it. I knew well that voice. It was premonitory of coming destruction. Not like that indescribably melodious sound of the wind on the ocean, but more broken, fierce, yet sweet. For the wind on the ocean is married to the sea, and deals with it as with a bride. Its sounds are always full of music, until it meets some intruder, and then with shriek and cry of madness it bears away the stranger. But on land the wind seems hurrying to its bride, and angry at every obstruction. So now. The trees swung to and fro on the ridge, and waved and tossed their arms in confused fright; until at length they were suddenly released from their terror and stood still. But the ensuing silence was fearful. I saw a commotion in the center of the black cloud; I heard a roar, indistinct at first, then loud as thunder; and on the top of the ridge, a hundred rods from the highest peak, I suddenly saw a giant oak go down, and a pathway was opened, and a hundred trees lay by it as the storm came down the hill. I was chained to my place. I could not move, but gazed. They swept away like straws those noble trees; some writhed for an instant, and tossed their branches high up, and turned quite around, as if to face the tempest, and then fell crashing. Others lifted no hand, but bowed their old heads, on which the spring was but just shedding its blessings, and, Cæsar-like, seemed to fold their mantles around them as they fell. Some of them, I thought, looked at the wind with mournful look before they fell, a sort of "et tu brute" look, for they had fancied that the centuries had made the wind their friend. You see how quickly I had personified them. I had no thought of danger myself, but pitied the forest. In fact, the track of the hurricane was across the hill side, and not toward me; so that I was perfectly safe, until the usual general tempest which follows a hurricane should reach me. When that came, as it did at length, I was thoroughly drenched before I could reach the cabin, and I thought for a half hour that the logs would not hold together; but they stood it bravely, and the sun shone out clearly at 2 o'clock on a green and lovely scene. Only the track of the wild wind was desolate, The fine old trees lay in confused masses, leaving a broad pathway open for the next storm that may come that way. This morning we crossed the river and went up to look at the ruins. They presented a sad scene. The forest is full of such scenes. In many places we came across piles of fallen trees, all lying in the same direction, in a narrow line extending for miles, heaped on one another, and all giving unquestionable evidence that they met their fate together. I have never seen a more thorough work of destruction than this of yesterday has been.

DEATH NOT PAINFUL.—We think that most persons have been led to regard dying as a much more painful change than it generally is; first because they have found by what they experienced in themselves and observed in others, that sentient beings often struggle when in distress: hence struggling to them is a sign, an invariable sign of distress. But we may remark, that struggles are very from being invariabl signs of distress; muscular action and consciousness are two distinct things, often existing separately; and we have abundant reason to believe that in a great proportion of cases, those struggles of dying men which are so distressing to behold, are as entirely independent of consciousness as the struggles of a recently decapitated fowl. A second reason why men are led to regard dying as a very painful change, is, because men often endure great pain without dying, and forgetting that the like causes produce like effects only under similar circumstances, they infer that life cannot be destroyed without still greater pain. But the pains of death are much less than most persons have been led to believe, and we doubt not that many persons who live to the age of puberty, undergo tenfold more misery than they would, did they understand correct views concerning the change. In all cases of dying, the individual suffers no pain after the sensibility of his nervous system is destroyed, which is often without any previous pain.

Those who are struck dead by a stroke of lightning those who are instantly destroyed by a crush of the brain, experience no pain at all in passing from a state of life to a dead state. One moment's expectation of being thus destroyed far exceeds in misery the pain during the act. Those who faint in having a little blood taken from the arm, or on any other occasion, have already endured all the misery they ever would did they not again revive. Those who die of fevers and most other diseases suffer their greatest pain, as a general thing, hours, or even days, before they expire.—The sensibility of the nervous system becomes gradually diminished; their pain becomes less and less acute under the same existing cause; and at the moment when their friends think them in the greatest distress, they are more at ease than they have been for many days previous; their disease, as far as respects their feelings, begins to act upon them like an opiate. Indeed, many are already dead as it respects themselves, when ignorant bystanders are much the most to be pitied, not for the loss of their friends, but their sympathizing anguish. Those diseases which destroy life without immediately affecting the nervous system, give rise to more pain than those that do affect the system so as to impair its sensibility.—

The most painful deaths which human beings inflict upon each other are produced by rack and faggot. The halter is not so cruel as either of these, but more savage than the axe. Horror and pain considered, it seems to us that we should choose a narcotic to either.—Charles Knowlton M. D.

The Two Brothers.

The following beautiful Arabian legend we copy from the "Voice of Jacob:"

The site occupied by the temple of Solomon was formerly a cultivated field, possessed in common by two brothers. One of them was married and had several children; the other was unmarried—they lived together, however, cultivating in the greatest harmony possible, the property they had inherited from their father.

The harvest soon had arrived. The two brothers bound up their sheaves and made two equal stacks of them and left them on the field. During the night, the unmarried brother was struck with an excellent thought: "My brother," said he to himself, "has a wife and children to support; it is not just that my share of the harvest should be as large as his." Upon this he arose, and took from his stack several sheaves, which he added to those of his brother; and this he did with as much secrecy, as if he had been committing an evil action, in order that his brotherly offering might not be refused. On the same night the other brother awoke, and said to his wife—"My brother lives alone without a companion; he has no one to assist him in his labor, nor to reward him for his toils, while God has bestowed on me a wife and children; it is not right that we take from our common field as many sheaves as he, since we have already more than he has—domestic happiness.—If you consent, we shall, by adding secretly, a certain number of our sheaves to his stack, by way of compensation, and without his knowledge, see his portion of the harvest increase." The project was approved, and immediately put into execution.

In the morning each of the brothers went to the field, and were much surprised at seeing the stacks still equal. During several successive nights the same contrivance was repeated on both sides, for as each kept adding to his brother's store, the stacks always remained the same. But one night both having stood centries to dive into the cause of this miracle, they met, each bearing the sheaves mutually destined for the other. It was thus all elucidated, and they rushed into each other's arms, each grateful to Heaven for having so good a brother.

Now, says the legend, the place where so good an idea simultaneously occurred to the two brothers, and with so much pertinacity, must have been acceptable to God. Men blessed it, and Israel chose it, there to erect the house of the Lord!"

WHAT A "GENTLEMAN" MAY DO, AND WHAT HE MAY NOT DO.—He may carry a brace of partridges, but not a leg of mutton. He may be seen in the omnibus box at the opera, but not on the box of an omnibus. He may be seen in a stall inside the theatre, but not at a stall outside one. He may dust another person's jacket, but must not brush his own. He may kill a man in a duel, but he mustn't eat peas with his knife. He may thrash a coal heaver, but he musn't ask twice for soup. He may pay his debts of honor, but he need not trouble himself about his tradesman's bills. He may drive a stage coach, but he musn't take or carry coppers. He may ride a horse as jockey, but he musn't exert himself in the least to get his living. He musn't never forget what he owes as a gentleman to his tailor. He may do any thing, to any body, in fact, within the range of a gentleman—go through the insolvent debtor's court, or turn billiard marker—but he must never, on any account, carry a brown parcel, or appear in the street without a pair of gloves.—*N. A Bit of Romance.

From the Chicago Daily Tribune.

It is a trite but at the same time true remark that the real incidents of life constantly occurring around us, possess a far more romantic interest than the fanciful ones conceived in the teeming brain of the novelist. Of this the following 'o'er true tale,' told us in brief by the Steward of the packet-boat Louisiana on Saturday, will furnish an illustration:

Some ten years ago, as our readers will remember, there was what was termed a 'rebellion' in Canada, and after the 'patriots' were subdued, some were summarily executed, and a portion banished, for a long term of years to Australia.—Most of these latter were men with families, from which they were torn without mercy, to expiate in a far-distant land, by imprisonment and hard labor, the crime of having failed in their attempt to rid their country of the evils of misgovernment. We think they acted very unwisely in proceeding to the extremities they did, but this point we will not stop to consider. With one of these expatriated men our tale has chiefly to do.

For seven or eight weary years he had borne the hardships of a lonely captivity, hopeless of ever seeing home or friends again, when a general amnesty was proclaimed by the British Government in regard to all, with one or two exceptions, of those who had been concerned in the rebellion. Our hero was now at liberty, and his first thought was to seek his home. But he had no means to pay his passage there, and he accordingly shipped on board a whaling vessel, which, at the end of two years more, landed him upon his native shores.

'Wife, children and friends' filled his thoughts, and he hastened on to his old residence in Canada. Everything remained as it had been—friends and neighbors greeted him as he passed along—but how his heart sunk within him to find the homestead deserted, and to learn that his wife had been married two years to another, supposing the 'husband of her youth' to be dead. She and her new-found mate, had left that part of the country and settled somewhere in Illinois.

The poor man felt desolate indeed, and he determined to see, and if possible to reclaim his wife and children. After weary travel and many inquiries he traced them to Knox county, Illinois, where they were comfortably settled in their new home. There he presented himself a few days since. The wife could not have been more surprised or pained to see an apparition from the grave, for she had long considered him as dead. The new husband, too, was rather disagreeably surprised to see before him a claimant for his wife. What should be done? The first husband was anxious to obtain the lady, the second was disinclined to give her up, looking upon his 'claim' as good.

They were reasonable people all round. The original claimant remained in the neighborhood a couple of weeks, during which time the matter was frankly talked over. At last the rivals came to the very just and rational conclusion that the lady was the proper person to make a final decision of the question, and to her it was mutually agreed to refer it, giving her time to consider it in all its bearings.

What more perplexing position could a woman be placed in than this? Here were two men with almost equal claims upon her affections. One was the father of all her children, but one the companion of her youth—the other, bound to her heart by near and sacred ties, and by the mutual love they bore an infant that had been born to them.—She could not for a time decide—what true-hearted woman could? A tumult of thoughts and emotions filled her heart, alternately swaying her from side to side. Thus the conflict lasted for several days, during which time she was enabled to look clearly into her own heart, and at last she was ready for a decision. Which could she choose but the man around whom were twined the tendrils of a first and strong affection—to whom she had given the first offerings of her heart? The needle may vibrate for a time, but it points at last with unfailing constancy to the never-setting star fo the north; and in like manner, the heart of a true woman, having in the wide universe but one fitting mate, will, after all vicissitudes, turn lovingly to the sunny warmth of 'first, only love.'

A disposition of the youngest child must now be made, and it was mutually agreed by the two men, that, as it could not be deprived of a mother's care, the first husband should take it with the other children, to be restored to the father at some future time. The reunited family now made preparations to go to a new home; and so great was the interest excited in the neighborhood by this singular affair, that as many as a hundred and fifty persons from the neighborhood were present to witness their departure. On Saturday last they came up in the packet Louisiana, on their way to Michigan, where they will take up their residence.

We naturally sympathize with the first husband, to whom wife and children are restored, but who will not feel for the bereavement of the second?

Lake Pleasant — Glorious Fishing.—The editor and correspondents of the Spirit of the Times have time and again told us of the glorious fishing in Lake Pleasant, Hamilton county, and a friend who has recently made an excursion thither, fully confirms all that has been said of it in that excellent sporting paper. Although only about a mile and a half in circumference, it contains some of the largest trout this side of the jumping-off place. They have been taken of the enormous weight of thirty odd pounds, we believe, and our friends had a two hours' tussle with a seventeen pounder, which he finally killed, with an ordinary fly-rod and a very light line, after attempting to gaff the fish, and pulling out the shaft of the instrument in trying to pull him in. Our friend and a companion, in three days took between six and seven hundred pounds of lake and brook trout, including one fish of 17 pounds, several of 15 pounds, 11 pounds, 9 pounds, and 5 pounds, and down to 3 pounds, 2 pounds, 1 pound, and ½ pound. The largest brook trout taken weighed over two pounds. Besides the bites from the fish, they had any quantity of mosquito bites, and were a good deal annoyed by a black fly, indigenous to that region, and remarkably pertinacious and blood-thirsty.

Hamilton county, especially the northen part of it, seems to be a sort of terra incognita to the people of the rest of the State. The spot where our friend camped, is nineteen miles from any house, and he and his fellow sportsman lodged in a shanty made of boughs, and built up immense fires every night to keep off the wolves, "bars," panthers, mosquitoes, and other insects. Twenty miles north from that point the whole region is an unreclaimed wilderness, full of "varmints," and entirely uninhabited. It is a great sporting country, abounding in deer and other large game. By looking at the map, it will be seen that the county is the largest in the State except St. Lawrence.

We strongly advise our citizens, who have a taste for sport, and a soul above horse mackerel, and sand snipe, to put up their tackle and double barreled fowling pieces, next September, and make an irruption into the "primeval solitudes," in the vicinity and to the north of Lake Pleasant. The locale would not be unpleasant in this blazing weather; the lake, if we mistake not, being some 2,000 feet above the level of the sea.—N. Y. True Sun.

Power of Early Musical Impressions and Associations.

BY G. W. LUCAS.

From the Cleveland Herald.

During the war which broke out in 1754, between the French and English, a party of Indians from Canada entered Pennsylvania, burnt several houses and carried off many captives. Among these was a little German girl whose father was killed by the Indians, but her mother escaped.—The name of the little girl was Regina, and she was given to an old Indian woman. While with the Indians in Canada, Regina never forgot her kind parents, nor the little hymn which they had taught her to sing. In the year 1764, that excellent man, Colonel Bouquet, was sent with a small army against the Indians who carried off Regina.—He soon conquered the Indians, released all the captives they had taken in Pennsylvania, among whom was Regina, and then returned with them to Carlisle, in that State. He then gave public notice that the parents who had lost children by the Indians might come and see if they were among the poor captives. The poor mother of Regina, among others, went to Carlisle to see if she could find her long-lost child. But when she got there, she did not know Regina, who had grown up and looked like the Indians. Thus disappointed, the poor mother stood weeping, when the kind hearted Colonel Bouquet came up to her and said—"Do you recollect nothing by which your child might be discovered?" Nothing, replied the mother, but a little hymn which I taught her to sing, and which is as follows:

"Alone, and yet not alone am I,
Though in this solitude so drear:
I feel my Savior always nigh,
He comes the weary hour to cheer:
I am with Him and He with me—
E'en here alone I cannot be!"

The Colonel desired her to sing the hymn as she used to do. She had sung but two lines when Regina rushed from the crowd, began to sing also, and threw herself into her mother's arms. Thus the dear child was found.

How important, then, is the power of Musical Association! We might as well look for the flowers of Paradise upon the burning sand as for pleasure in Music without this principle.

Utility.—Man's use and function (and let him who will not grant me this follow me no further, for this I purpose always to assume) is to be the witness of the glory of God, and to advance that glory by his reasonable obedience and resultant happiness. Whatever enables us to fulfil this function, is in the pure and first sense of the word useful to us. Pre-eminently, therefore, whatever sets the glory of God more brightly before us. But things that only help us to exist, are in a secondary and mean sense, useful, or rather, if they be looked for alone, they are useless and worse, for it would be better that we should not exist than that we should guiltily disappoint the purposes of existence. And yet people speak in this working age, when they speak from their hearts, as if houses, and lands, and food, and raiment were alone useful, and as if sight, thought and admiration, were all profitless, so that men insolently call themselves Utilitarians, who would turn, if they had their way, themselves and their race into vegetables; men, who think as far as such can be said to think, that the meat is more than the life, and the raiment than the body, who look to the earth as a stable, and its fruit as fodder; vinedressers and husbandmen, who love the corn they grind, and the grapes they crush, better than the gardens of the angels upon the slopes of Eden; hewers of wood and drawers of water, who think that the wood they hew and the waters they draw, are better than the pine forests that cover the mountains like the shadow of God, and than the great rivers that move like his eternity. And so comes upon us that woe of the preacher, that though God "has made every thing beautiful in his time, also he hath set the world in their hearts, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end."—Modern Painters.

LITERARY IMPOSTURES.—The N. Y. Literary World gathers from its late foreign journals the following literary scandal:

A Mr. Querard has recently published a work entitled "Literary Impostures Unveiled," a considerable portion of which is devoted to M. Dumas, so long a favorite with the cheap novel publishers here. His assumptions and impositions are unmercifully exposed. Of the forty-five dramas which go under his name, M. Dumas himself has only written four without assistance; and he is said "to have been always ready to honor a deceased writer by borrowing his aid," even to the extent of taking "scenes, characters and incidents wherever he could find them," and to use his own phrase, he "conquers" them, i. e. annexes them to his own "literary dominions." M. Dumas has always stoutly maintained that in all his productions, whether dramas, novels, histories, or travels, he never had any other literary assistance than that of M. Auguste Magnet. M. Querard makes out a list of seventy-four collaborators, whose names he gives, besides specifying the particulars of their assistance! Then again he is accused of having sold the works of others as his own. A rich instance is given. "Jacques Artis, par M. Dumas," was the title of a work published in 1839. This was nothing more nor less than a translation of "Ultime Lettere di Jacopo Ortis," by Ugo Foscolo: nor was the translation by M. Dumas himself—it was merely a republication of a translation published ten years before by M. Gosselin, with a few trifling alterations! To give a few more samples: A story by M. Mery, called "La Chasse au Chastre," was first "conquered" by M. Dumas for his "Impressions de Voyage dans le Midi de la France," and again, for the end of the sixth volume of "Le Chevalier du Maison Rouge." "Albine, on la Chambre Rouge," was a translation from the German, but purported to be original; "Georges" was written by M. Mallefille. Says the Athenæum: "'Fernande' is another pleasant example, originally written by M. Hippolyte Auger for the Revue de Paris. On his arrival in St. Petersburg, the author found his 'Olympe' christened 'Fernande' and signed Alexander Dumas. Is this not delicious? A writer quits France; and the great conqueror instantly 'annexes' his property, utterly reckless of consequences! These things are so incredible that the most positive testimony is wanted before we can even listen to them! but this evidence M. Querard has given." "Une Fille de Regent" was written by M. Canailhac; and omitting many other instances, we come to one which crowns the whole, viz: M. Florentino wrote the first part of "Monte Christo;" M. Auguste Maguet the second, as well as "Les trois Monsquetaires" and "Vingt Ans Apres," great part of them, however, being borrowed from the "Memoires d'Artagnan." M. Querard's book is a rich exposition of literary impostures, and the author appears to have had every facility for ascertaining the truth as far as regards his contemporaries. The correspondent of the Literary Gazette represents Dumas as immersed in politics, and writing a leader of three columns every day for the paper La Liberte; where he "conquers" a success of ridicule. So thanks to the revolution the liter ary manufactory is suspended for the present.

THE VIAMETER.—It was recently stated that the distance between Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico, had been measured by means of the "viameter." Not having been able to find a definition for this word in the dictionary, we were glad to meet with the following explanation in the Philadelphia Ledger:

In the year 1845, when Gen, Taylor and that portion of the army under him, was ordered to the Rio Grande, the late Lieut. George Stevens, of the 2d regiment of Dragoons, was despatched on topographical engineering service, and was ordered by Gen. Taylor to survey the route of the army from Fort Jessup, La., to Corpus Christi, Texas. Lieut. Stevens being an inventive genius, constructed this "viameter" out of an old wooden clock, and attached it to the axletree of a cart given him by his commanding general, for the purpose, and in the hub of the wheel he drove a spike, and every revolution of the wheel the spike would strike a pin in the clock and cause the hand to move one notch, thereby indicating the circumference of the wheel and the distance the army had travelled every day by looking at the "clock," as the officers used to say.

By this piece of mechanism Lieut. Stevens was enabled to make a perfect survey of the route for the army, a drawing of which is now in the War Department. Lieut. Stevens received some very flattering compliments from the President, the Secretary of War and Gen. Taylor, for the beautiful and ingenious style in which the survey was made.

A few days before the battles of the 8th and 9th of May, Lieut. Stevens, not knowing what might be his fate, desired that his Government should be the owner of this valuable invention. He gave it to the Quartermaster's department for the use of the U. States, and after passing through those battles unscathed, Lieut S. was drowned while leading his squadron across the Rio Grande on the 18th of May.

STEADY HABITS.—The Boston Daily Advertiser announces in its advertising columns the dissolution of the partnership of Messrs. TROTT & BUNSTEAD, an honorable, enterprising, and successful mercantile house, and one of the oldest firms in that city. Their partnership, says the Advertiser, has subsisted for a period of fifty years, and previous to their partnership, they had been apprentices in the same store for a period of seven years. Immediately adjoining this paragraph, we noticed another, in the same paper, copied from the Salem Register, which says a little fishing schooner that laid at one of the wharves of Salem last week, was manned by a crew consisting of skipper Marshall, aged 78; his brother aged 76; another man aged 76, and a boy 65. The vessel is 45 years old and the united ages of vessel and crew number 340 years! The skipper has followed the pursuit from the age of 9 years.

For the Western Literary Messenger

A Prayer.

God of the night and all its majesty,
Clouds and strange whispery winds and burning stars,
To Thee I call. A dimmed yet quenchless spark
Of thy own gift of being, seeks its source.

God of the lightnings, which with blazonry
Most wonderful, and the triumphant rolling
Of swift-wheeled chariots, are passing now.
To Thee I call: to Thee from out the depths,
Where sad, maternal earth all vainly pours
The faint sweet odor of her fading flowers
And her low, mournful melody of tone
On the unresisting sense of agony.
To Thee, to Thee I call; for thou alone
Who bidst the chainless lightnings and they come,
Spreading their flame-bright pinions to perform
Thy mandates, Thou alone canst break the gloom
Along the turbulent waves of human thought
With radiant truth; or speak the weariness
Of wronged and vain affections into rest.

God of my soul, who knowest its aching fear
And dread, deep, untold thirstings, bend, oh, bend
From thy unseen and awful grandeur now,
And let that gracious hand, whose thrilling touch
Gave more than life to Judah's leper, rest
Its hallowing, blest burden here—even here
On head and heart.

Mayville, N. Y. The Recluse.

June Exhibition of the Buffalo Horticultural Society.

Horticultural Rooms, June 22, 1848.

The committee on flowers, and flowering plants, having duly examined the within mentioned contributions, beg leave to offer the following report:—

Your committee cannot resist the temptation here so strongly offered to make a few general remarks upon the rise and progress of the acts and doings of this society.

The fair this day held, is the second of the series for this season; and it has been universally conceded by an unusually large concourse of visitors, to have been in all respects, far superior in point of quality and excellence of specimens, and variety, to any of the preceding exhibitions of the society. This may be readily accounted for, in the improved knowledge and progressive cultivation of taste—a nicer discriminating judgment based upon a higher standard than has heretofore existed with us. Our citizens generally, and especially the ardent zeal of our ladies, are becoming far more enlisted in the enchanting employment of Floriculture generally; and the greatly increased number of the members of the society, with the benefit of mutual interchanged opinions upon the subject of skill and method, are strongly evidenced, in each succeeding fair; and affords another strong claim, were it wanting, to the good wishes and fostering care of all who would refine both the head and the heart, and render home a delight, by creating and cultivating a charm which endears it with many of the most prominent and natural pleasures.

Our commonly termed "June Roses," or those which bloom but once in the season, of the class "Old French and Provence Roses"—with some very proper exceptions,—as the varieties: George IV., Madame Hardy, White Unique, Hundred Leaved, Persian Yellow, Yellow Cabbage, York and Lancaster &c., with some of the pillar and trailing varieties, as well also as that truly beautiful and unique class, the Moss Roses, which will ever command the delight and labor of the florist. With these and some other exceptions, the June Roses are fast giving place to a new and far more splendid and interesting class. The "Hybrid Perpetuals" and "Remontantes," which, from their remarkable luxuriance of growth, and free blooming qualities—blooming as they do throughout the whole season, and until the cold and freezing blast of November, cuts off hundreds of yet unexpanded buds. Their splendor of size is oftimes enormous, (witness La Reine) rich in fragrance, remarkably double, of every tint and color, and whose foliage is peculiar for its size and lusturous green. It is not to be wondered then, that the rose of this month should be supplanted by so prolific and charming a rival.

The Hybrid China Roses, the parents from which these "Perpetuals" are derived, are crosses or cross breeds between the China Tea-Scented-noisette and Bourbon roses, fertilized by the French Provence or other summer roses. These then are Mules or Hybrids, but as some of them mature seed in the Hep, they have been crossed again with other Chinese and Bourbons, from which seed this new and distinctive class "Hybrid Perpetuals" have sprung, having the properties of great and continuous flowering with vigorous growth, and tolerable hardihood. In this class are the splendid varieties, La Reine, Mad. Laffay, William Jessie, Prince Albert, and many others which are truly splendid.

Among the many beautiful "Noisette Roses," in whose peculiarity of growth lies the great clusters of corymbs of flowers generally cupped, forming oftimes twenty or thirty in a cluster, and exceedingly beautiful and of a more hardy habit than the Tea Roses, are found many splendid yellow, viz: Chromatella (cloth of gold) Solfaterre, Amie Vibert, La Marque, Julie de Lyones, &c.

Among the Bourbons, which are remarkable for their large sized flowers, profuse clusters, and vigorous shoots, often three or four feet long, covered with a splendid corymb of flowers, and which are also generally cupped; we find Prince Albert, Mad. Suchet, Emily Plantier. Paul Joseph, Countess Mole, &c. These varieties, with proper attention will bloom freely in pots during the winter months. Here then, we have a class of the "Queen of Flowers," worthy of our praise and labor, and it were but justice that we should acknowledge the fountain head, from which has sprung the great majority of these floral treasures. To Colonel B. Hodge of the Horticultural gardens, are we chiefly indebted, for the liberal enterprise in obtaining a large and splendid collection of Europe's choicest roses, his list on show being but a tithe of his valuable collection. (These are on sale by him, at very moderate rates,) We would not fail to notice the delegation visiting us from the Horticultural society of the valley of the Genesee, in the person of Mr. P. Barry, of the firm of Elwanger & Barry, who contributed a splendid collection of Roses, and other rare and beautiful flowers which are enumerated below. Mr. Bissell, of the firm of Messrs. Bissell, Hooker & Sloane, and that deservedly well-known Pomologist and flourist N. Goodsell of Greece—we welcome them with pleasure. We were also visited by the executive committee of the N. Y. S. A. Society, and its highly respected and efficient Secretary, Col. B. P. Johnson; they having been in session during the week.

To our lady committees, both senior and junior; as well the volunteer committee in assistance, and to our worthy and ever tasteful secretary Mr. W. Coleman, we would offer our grateful thanks.—Their untiring assiduity and good taste, exhibited in decorating the Hall, and the arrangement of the boquets &c., met an universal approbation.

To Mr. W. H. Glenny for the use of glass ware, we would tender our best thanks.

The throng of visitors during the day and evening was very great, and more than doubled any previous exhibition, your committee were particularly gratified with the general careful observation made by visiters upon specimen flowers, and the nice discriminating judgement exercised in defining their peculiar excellencies. During the afternoon a portion of the pupils of the public schools visited the Hall. The President having extended an invitation to their teachers to bring such of their pupils as they might think proper, for half an hour, from half past two to three, P. M. on each day of exhibition. J. Keel—The best blood beets, carrots, onions, radishes, peas and turneps, all of which were super-excellent: and that A. Bryant & Sons, the best rhubarb, which was truly magnificent and worthy of all admiration.

Signed, in behalf of the Committee.

H. A. PARSONS.

REPORT ON FRUITS.

The Committee on Fruits having examined the various specimens offered for exhibition, beg leave to submit the following report:—

Your committee report that owing to the cold rains which prevailed last spring, and other unfavorable causes, the fruit crop has been materially injured, and particularly so as regards cherries and plums. The ravages of the curculio seem unabated, this season, the salt remedy for which has generally proved a failure. Cherries generally set very well, but subsequently became blasted, or shriveled, from the effect of either drouth or the sting of some insect. Your committee would beg leave to offer their congratulations upon the accession of an increased variety of the new and most highly esteemed kind of pears upon quince stocks which have been introduced among us.

The prospect of an abundant crop is considered to be quite flattering, the fruit having set remarkably well; and the committee trust that our amateurs of fruit will take care to preserve specimens of rare and new kinds, to be exhibited at the pomological convention, to be held here in September, under the authority of the State Agricultural Society.

A. Bryant & Sons—Exhibited strawberries of the following varieties, viz: Hovey's seedling, Bishop's orange, Myatt's new fins, Stoddard's seedling, longborough early scarlet, methven, the most of which were very fine, and excellent specimens. Cherries—white ox heart, goose berries—white amber, currants—red dutch.

Lewis Eaton—Exhibited cherries, 7 varieties, viz: bigareau de lyon, an early and fine variety of French cherry, and quite new in this vicinity, fully equal in size and flavor to the black tartaran and ripe earlier; early richmond, an early variety and extremely fine flavor; bleeding heart, early white heart, new may duke, white bigareau, holmans duke.

Dr. B. Burwell—Exhibited Strawberries, viz: Hovey's seedling, very large, showing good skill in cultivation, fine.

Chas. Taintor—Exhibited cherries, viz: Holmans duke, white bigareau, Wilmot's superb, Hovey's seedling, neck pine, Duke of Kent scarlet, white alpine, fine specimens for which Mr. T. has always been famed.

Mrs. Hiram Pratt, exhibited strawberries, Hovey's seedlings. Mrs. Pratt's strawberries have always a marked superiority and decidedly the best shown.

Charles C. Haddock, exhibited some fine specimens of black tartarian cherries from Cleveland, not, however, superior to those grown here.

Prof. W. R. Coppock, exhibited strawberries, four varieties, viz: Hovey's seedling, Stoddard's seedling, early scarlet, and white alpine. Good specimens.

LEWIS EATON,
CHAS. TAINTOR, } Committee.
W. W. MANN.

Just as our report was going to press the president received, per express, a box of sample cherries, from F. R. Elliot, Esq., of the Owl's Nest Cleveland. The varieties were as follows:—A seedling, unnamed, of a large size, sub-acid, rich flavor, and decidedly a firstrate cherry, doubtless of the Duke origin. Also a seedling No 127, closely resembling in size, color and flavor, the well known variety Belle de Choisy, but judging from the sample not its equal, Also, "Elliot's Favorite," an excellent fruit of rich flavor, and good size, not ripe enough to critically judge it, but yet think it hardly equal to the unnamed seedling. Also, late Bigarieu, a capital large fruit, not yet ripe. It would have given great pleasure had these specimens arrived in time for our June Exhibition, when they would have had a more extended examination. The President tenders the thanks of the Society to Mr. Elliot for his spirited and generous contribution.

THE LIFE OF SILAS WRIGHT, with an appendix. By JOHN S. JENKINS. Auburn: Alden and Markham.

"Indignant critics," says the North British Review, who find their tables loaded with the memoirs of persons, uninteresting to them, have a stereotyped complaint against the evil. Readers in the public libraries complain that sound literature will soon be drowned, being already chin-deep among the biographies of nobodies. Indeed some impatient gentlemen propose sanitary measures for the health of the republic of letters, and would abate biographical nuisances by an improved system of critical sewerage."

Such is the outcry in Great Britain against an overflowing Nile of biographies. No such evil exists in this country, consequently there is no necessity of cleansing the Augean stables of our current literature on this account. But "were biographies to be as common as tomb stones," they would not be too numerous, if the subjects of them were all as worthy as he was, whose life lies before us.

Silas Wright was the Cincinnatus of the 19th century. He was the only statesman of our nation who was "awful at the plough." A tiller of the soil from a love of the employment: carrying the simplicity, and industry, and honesty of the farmer into the halls of legislature, and possessing powers of mind that awed greatness itself, he towered in the Senate of the United States like a colossal statue; and when he fell, the shock more powerful than an earthquake, was felt in every part of the land.

"The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun." Silas Wright was a great hope of a great republic—the idol of his party, and the pride of his country: and shadows fell over the land when he sank to rest. The character and career of the subject of this biography, like that of John Quincy Adams—another great luminary whose last beams fell upon the new-made grave of his compeer—should be carefully studied by the young men of the country; and the work before us will be found a valuable assistant in performing the duty.

SYMPATHY OF NATURE FOR HER PAINTERS.—Sir Walter Scott says,

> they do not err
> Who say, that when the poet dies,
> Mute Nature mourns her worshipper,
> And celebrates his obsequies.

And Bryant, in his funeral oration on the death of Thomas Cole, says that "the landscape painter is admitted to a closer familiarity with nature than the poet. He studies her aspect more minutely and watches with more affectionate attention its varied expressions. Not one of her forms is lost upon him; not a gleam of sunshine penetrates her green recesses, not a cloud casts its shadow unobserved by him; every tint of the morning or the evening, if the gray or the golden morn, if the near or the remote object, is noted by his eye and copied by his pencil. All her boundless variety of outlines and shades become almost a part of his being, and are blended with his mind."

"We might imagine therefore, he continues a sound of lament for him whom we have lost in the voice of the streams and in the sighs of the winds among the groves, and an aspect of sorrow in earth's solitary places; we might dream that the conscious valleys miss his accustomed visits, and that the autumnal glories of the woods are pale because of his departure."

We can add nothing to the above. It is the modest poet modestly breathing, in the form of prose, the tributary feelings of regard over the grave of a brother artist of a kindred school.

LADY'S BOOK.—Godey cannot be outdone. He is not only in advance of everybody else in the commencement of the new volume of his Magazine, but we venture to say, that this (the July) number cannot be surpassed in elegance of embellishment, or in the variety and ability of its articles. Such names as Simms, Rockwell, Tuckerman, T. Buchanan Read, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Ellet, Miss Leslie, Mrs. Neal, &c. are a sufficient guaranty of its worth.

The body of GEORGE WRIGHT who was drowned in Rochester on Friday of last week, was found Saturday, brought to this city Sunday Morning and interred in the afternoon. The funeral was attended at Swan Street Methodist Church where his brother is stationed. He was possessed of an amiable disposition, winning manners, and a true heart for his friends.

Later from the Sandwich Islands.

By Overland Express across the Isthmus via New Orleans, we have received files of Sandwich Islands papers and dispatches to the 1st of March last.

From Honolulu.—Charles E. Hitchcock. Esq., has been appointed Director of the Government Press and Editor of The Polynesian. His salutatory is highly creditable to the man and to the country whence it emanates. The establishment is the property of the Government, but Mr. Hitchcock, in assuming the chair editorial, avers that in doing so he is entirely untrammeled—that he is only bound to the Government so far as to publish its laws, decrees. etc., but that he is free to discuss and animadvert upon any measures contrary to the interests of the country, and that he will ever maintain his freedom in that respect.

Dueling appears to be in vogue at Honolulu as well as in the United States. A duel was fought there the latter part of February, on Sunday, and all the parties to it, principals and seconds, were brought before the Police Court and fined $10 each for desecrating the Sabbath and a breach of the public peace.

The progress which the Hawaiian Government and people are making in the adoption of laws, manners and habits similar to those of civilized countries, is surprising.

From Tahiti.—On the first of January every thing was quiet and business beginning to assume a more settled aspect. The demand for merchandise was limited, owing in a measure to the entrenching policy of the new Governor, M. Lavaud.

Rear Admiral Bruat had left for France, taking with him a Tahitian Chief named Taariirii and seven youths, whose parents stipulated they should be educated by a Protestant.

The new Governor avows good intentions, having taken measures to restrain excesses in dancing and drunkenness and entirely prohibiting the importation of ardent spirits. Not even the Consular corps are allowed to land them for their own consumption. We doubt, however, whether it will be possible to prevent its importation.

Queen Pomare was residing in the Government house. She had engaged Rev. Mr. Thompson, Protestant Missionary at Papeete, to educate her children. She has had a farther addition to her family, making the sixth child now living.

From Samoa.—Samoa is in a dreadful state at present - they have professedly been going to war for the last three months. The people on the western part of Upola have left their houses and lands to prevent war, and are now living on the various parts of the islands with their friends.—Things are far from being settled.—N. Y. Sun.

Deserter Riley and his Men.—A letter to the Cincinnati Commercial, dated City of Mexico, May 7th, says: I have seen the deserter Riley at the Citadel, taken at Contreras, with fifty other deserters, wearing balls and chains, They are to lie in prison here until after the war is over, and then to be taken to the largest cities of the United States, with their heads shaved, and then be drumed out. There have been about fifty already hung, taken at Chapultepec. Those in prison are all branded with the letter D, on the right cheek.

The Slave Insurrection.—Capt. Knapp, of brig Ann, states that when he left Matanzas on the 11th inst., the slave insurrection at Martinique and other places was not known. The Spanish Government will probably do their best to keep such news from the ears of their slave.—Boston Transcript.

More Indian Insurrection—Tuspan Threatened.—The schr. John Bell, Capt. McLaughlin, arrived last evening from Tuspan, which she left on the 1st June. We are placed under great obligations to Capt. McLaughlin for important information of the state of affairs at Tuspan. At the time of the sailing of the John Bell, there was the greatest panic and alarm among the people, on account of the threatened attack of the Indians, who had surrounded the place in great numbers, estimated by some as high as 8,000. They were but 12 leagues from Tuspan, and were steadily advancing upon it. At Tamiagua the Indians killed several whites, and were about to execute others. The people of Tuspan are under arms, and a constant patrol is kept up. A command of horse was sent to rescue the whites who had been captured by the Indians and condemned to be executed.—The war steamer Vixen, lying near Tuspan, sent a company of marines and some ammunition to aid in defence of the town. One of our armed schooners was moored at the bridge, ready to open a fire upon the Indians, as soon as they appeared. There was no other American vessels at Tuspan when Capt. McLaughlin left.—N. O. Delta, 14th.

Kentucky.—The Slave States are moving. Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and Kentucky have spoken in words that burn. Kentucky has again raised her voice. The following resolutions were adopted unanimously at a meeting of friends of humanity recently held in Lewis county:

Resolved, As slavery is the question of the age—an institution affecting the interest of almost every individual, and is intimately connected with the national affairs of this Government, necessarily affecting its ultimate peace and safety—we therefore deem it the duty of every individual of the nation, and especially of our State and National Representatives, to meet and investigate the subject with great candor and faithfulness.

Resolved, That we greatly admire, and highly commend, the bold, faithful, and yet respectful manner in which John P. Hale, in the Senate of the United States, has discussed the question of Slavery in its relations to the National Government, and the policy of the Nation in regard to it sextension.

Resolved, That we highly esteem the late speech of Mr. Hale, (in which he shows that slavery and its extension was the true and grand moving cause of our war with Mexico,) as a speech replete with valuable truths—and here express our wish that the friends of Freedom and Truth will put that speech in pamphlet form, and send it to every neighborhood, if not every family in the Nation.

Restored to his Rank.—Capt. James Reynolds, of the New Jersey Battalion, who returned from Mexico a short time ago, under the sentence of a court martial, dismissing him from the service, has been restored to his rank by a recent decision of the President, reversing the decision of the court. The charges preferred against the Captain were for an alleged violation of orders and insubordination, but the testimony proved that the orders given him were of such a character that he would have been equally liable to the charge if he had acted in any other manner than that for which he was censured. Capt. Reynolds is a citizen of Philadelphia, who exhibited a praiseworthy zeal in organizing a company, with much expense and labor, to assist in making up the requisition upon New Jersey, and we are gratified that the President has relieved him from the reproach unjustly thrown upon him by the decision of the Court Martial. He will now rejoin his company on its return from Mexico.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Late and Interesting from Martinique.

From the N. Y. Herald.

By the arrival of the brig Columbus, Captain Webster, we are placed in possession of intelligence from Martinique, one of the French West India Islands, to the 2d inst.

On board the Columbus are Messrs. J. B. Duchamp, E. Duchamp, L. Duchamp, F. Crassous, T. Regnal, and T. Desgrotto, formerly wealthy planters of the Island, who, with their families, in all thirty-five persons, were obliged suddenly to seek refuge on board the vessel to save their lives. They escaped from the shore in the night, leaving all their property behind. Fears were entertained that the blacks would attack the brig, but Captain Webster gallantly determined, and made every preparation, to resist any attempt of the kind. For Capt. Webster's efforts in their behalf, the above unfortunate persons express their heartfelt gratitude, and that is all that they have to offer him, not having saved hardly a dollar of their valuable property.

The blacks were massacreing the white inhabitants daily. Some thirty-six persons, including women and children, were on one occasion driven into a house, the building set on fire, and with its unfortunate inmates, entirely consumed.

The white inhabitants were fleeing to every place that afforded the possibility of an asylum from the vindictive assaults of their foes. A number had escaped to New Orleans. Some captains of vessels had declined taking any of the refugees on board their vessels, fearing an attack from the blacks.

Business of all kinds was at a stand; several vessels were in port, unable to dispose of their cargoes.

Capt. Webster is of opinion that if assistance were not speedily received, the place would be entirely destroyed.

The new Governor, appointed by the French Republic, had not arrived, but was daily expected

The decree of the French Government, abolishing Slavery in the Colony, took effect on the 23d of May. The official announcement of the fact is contained in the Courrier de la Martinique of the 24th of May. A general amnesty for all political offences is annexed to the decree, coupled with some local provisions for the future tranquility of the colony, which recent disturbances have rendered needful.

Further particulars will be found, detailed in our correspondence, and in the extract which we give below:

St. Pierre, Martinique, May 31, 1848.

At the present time, matters here appear to be more settldd, although order is far from being restored. How long it may continue so, we are unable to judge. Business of every descriptisn is at a complete stand, and confusion has bewildered the mind of every one. This state of things has destroyed all confidence, and caused a wretchedness unequal to any description.

We received news yesterday from Guadeloupe, and we are informed that the Governor of that Island, on being made acquainted with events here, immediately abolished slavery likewise, in the Island of Guadeloupe and its dependencies; but in so doing, took such precautionary measures as to protect life and property, and matters there passed off in a quiet and orderly manner.

The inhabitants of the Island repose all their trust and all their hopes for the future, in the abilities and wisdom of the recently appointed Governor (Perrinton,) to this Island, and whose arrival is looked for with very anxious eagerness.

Many families and private individuals are leaving this daily, for other countries, principally to the United States, which is, in fact, the only country at the present time where one can live in peace, and find protection. The brig Columbus takes away no less than 30 passengers, and every vessel leaving the island will have as many in proportion.

Murder!—Incendiarism!—Abolition of Slavery!—Our worst anticipations, we find with pain, have been surpassed in the state of general confusion and anarchy into which things have fallen under the new system at Martinique of "Liberte, Egalite, Fraternite." Fire and bloodshed have been resorted to by the negroes, to hasten that freedom which, unfortunately, had not been given them before; and, thus suffering themselves to be intimidated, the authorities have surrendered the power into the hands of the rabble, and slavery has been abolished. There is no safety, under the existing saturnalia, to life or property, in Martinique; and numbers of the inhabitants have been forced to seek it by flight to other countries. We have only space for the following harried details given by an eye-witness.

On Monday, the 22d instant, a negro slave was sent to gaol by his master, Mr. Leo Duchamp, a planter in the neighborhood of St. Pierre, for something he had uttered of cutting his master and mistress's heads off and burying them in the sand. Shortly after, the whole gang of the estate, joined by a great many others, went to the gaol to rescue their fellow slave. On seeing this, the Mayor had some soldiers called out to resist the mob, and was on the eve of dispersing it by the force of arms, when Mr. Papy, adjoint-mayer, found proper to set the prisoner at liberty. The mob, pushed on by some evil-minded rascals among the colored free, continued to complain of Mr. Duchamp's behaviour towards his negroes.—Collecting in great numbers towards evening, they began to show the intention of firing the town. About 7 o'clock the first incendiary torch was applied, the house of Mr. De Sanois being the first taken in their diabolical design: it was then occupied by two families of planters, (the Lesueurs and Lilettes,) to whom some other persons had joined themselves, making in all 33 or 34 persons, mostly women and children. The mob entered the house below, and began by breaking up some furniture. Unfortunately, whilst they were leaving the premises, one of the inmates (Mr. Desabaya,) standing on the staircase above, fired a gun on the invaders, and killed one of them. Exasperated at the death of their comrade, they re-entered the house, made one heap of all the furniture, and of the staircase, which they cut down, and then set fire to the whole. Excepting three gentlemen, who escaped, half burnt and much bruised, by throwing themselves from the second story into the yard, the inmates all perished in the flames! During this awful scene, which lasted three or four hours, the authorities of the town sent nobody to the rescue of the unfortunates. The fire engines going to the spot, were stopped on the way by the brigands: and when they at last arrived, it was too late. The violence of the fire, pushed by a strong breeze, consumed three or four houses more in the same street (la Lorgnette) belonged mostly to people of color.

The fire was also put in another street at some distance, to three fine houses occupied by Mr. Marin, an engineer, Mr. Portal, and Mr. Lalaurette: the first, who is a young European, escaped with his lady unhurt, but very marvellously, having had several shots fired at him; they lost every thing they had in the house, and did not save even a second shirt. The scoundrels continued masters of the town during all that night, running through all the streets, threatening death and fire to the whites. They killed with pistol-shot the elder son of Mr, Fourniol, a young man of about 22 years old, of excellent disposition, who was harmlessly standing on the perron of a friend's door on the Savanne du Mouillage, with his mother near him, in whose arms he fell to breathe his last. Such were the monstrous deeds perpetrated on Monday night; and, to prevent a recurrence, the Governor, Gen. Rostoland, instead of calling to aid the soldiery and marines, who were themselves in the greatest eagerness to be called forth, thought better to grant the boon of freedom to the republican heroes and murderers; and, accordingly, the abolition of slavery was proclaimed in all the streets of St. Pierre on Tuesday, the 23d inst., and throughout the whole island on the following day! It may be better imagined than described what is the carousing of the new citoyens, parading the streets on foot, or mounted on horses or mules, with all sorts of flags and banners, and shouting Vive la liberte! Vive Bissette! Vive Perrinon! &c. Mr. Perrinon has not yet arrived.—The female population, white and colored, were thrown into great alarm by the events of Monday night, and a large number of them, with many men also, fled on board of the vessels in port, which were luckily numerous, about 28 or 30 in all. The larger ships received 200 or 300 each. Many have since returned on shore. Several families are preparing to leave the island, and numbers have already quitted.

Liverpool, June 9.

Wheat—A moderate fresh supply of wheat from European ports, and a few small parcels of Indian corn, but of all other produce, whether British or foreign, the imports of the past few days are exceedingly light. The supplies of wheat, Indian corn and beans, recently into Cork and Falmouth, have been mostly ordered to their several destinations; and there are scarcely any subsequent arrivals at those ports. Duties on foreign wheats have advanced 9s per qr., and on flour to 5s 5d per bbl., being the only change this week therein. The trade for most leading articles has ruled very flat between Tuesday and today, at almost nominal rates, except Indian corn and corn meal, which assumed a firmer aspect, and upon a renewal of demand, each has acquired some improvement in value.

Prime old brands of the latter in one or two cases, commanded somewhat higher terms. Of foreign oats, several hundred parcels were disposed of within the range of our last quotations, but in other descriptions, or in oat meal, scarcely any business was apparent, and must be deemed the turn lower in value. Having several Irish buyers here this morning, Indian corn was taken rather freely at an advance of 1s to 2s per qr. over the reduced rates of Tuesday; and corn meal was held firmly at an advance of 6d per bbl. each exhibiting a farther tendency upward.

DEPARTURE OF MISSIONARIES.—We announced the other day the intended departure, from Providence for Western Africa, of several missionaries and their wives, viz., the Rev. John Leighton and wife, Rev. Albert Bushnell and wife, Rev. Ira M. Preston and wife, Rev. William T. Wheeler and Mrs. Mary R. Griswold, by the brig Smithfield. Those honored messengers of mercy sailed on Wednesday. We learn, from the Providence Journal, that most of the ministers of the city, connected with the enterprize, being absent at the Rhode Island consociation of Congregational Churches, the Rev. Dr. Wayland conducted the religious services, inploring, in an earnest and appropriate prayer, the Divine blessing upon these messengers of truth, who go out under the auspices of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Their destination is the Gaboon mission, on the Gabeen River, Western coast of Africa, and immediately under the equator. Mr. Wilson has labored in that field about thirteen years. Mr. Bushnell and Mrs. Griswold have also been engaged in the same work several years; the latter having lost two husbands, who were cut off in the midst of their work, and now goes back to labor alone.—N. Y. Com. Adv., 17th.

THE NIAGARA.—The steamer Niagara was towed down from Genesee River this morntng by the Cataract. She was raised a few days since, after much labor and repeated ineffectual attempts. The machinery is all out, and on the whole, she bears evidence of having had a rough time of it. She goes to the Marine Railway here for repairs, and we now confidently expect to see Capt. Childs and his favorite steamer afloat again as good as new, with the advantage (if any it be) of some pretty severe experience.—Oswego Adv.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—The noon train for the east, getting on as far as 12 miles from this city, ran off the track. The engine and cars were very much broken up, and the track tore up for several rods No person was materially injured. The damage to the train and road could not be repaired so as to enable the cars to go on with the passengers, and many of them returned to the city. The evening trains went on as usual.—Rochester Dem.

The Mystic Star.

There is among the Persians a superstitious belief that in Tinge an Eastern clime the inhabitants are perfectly happy, owing to the influence of the star Canopus, which rises nightly over the country.

From whence did'st thou come, O gentle star,
With thy healing beams of light,
And whose the hand that placed thee first
In the silent vault, of night?

Did'st thou shine where raptu'rous numbers burst,
From the joyous hosts on high,
As this fair and blushing world, came forth
From the dread immensity?

Or, art thou some guardian Angel's gem,
Set on the brow of even,
To mark where rest his pinions bright
In his flight of love through Heaven.

Whatever thou art, O! beautiful thing,
Wherever thy home may be,
Thy mellow rays have caught their light
From the throne of Deity.

They shine far off in an eastern sky,
And the dwellers of that clime,
Know not of the bitter tears we shed
As we count the sands of time.

O'er their breasts the dark relentless waves
Of sorrow may never roll,
For thy mystic beams shed perfect peace,
Through the restless human soul.

With the happy tones of nature's harp,
There comes a plaintive strain
From the human heart, whose trembling chords
May never be tuned again.

They fall on the ear, and breathe a tale,
So fraught with the deepest grief,
That the pitying spirits well might weep,
If their tears could bring relief.

They tell of hopes once blushing bright,
Now shrouded o'er in gloom,
Of voices sweet that charmed us once,
Now hushed in the silent tomb.

Of paths all sad, and lonely now,
Where loved one's footsteps trod.
Of forms once warm, with life and love,
Now mouldering 'neath the sod.

They tell of all those varied scenes,
That make this life of ours,
As changeful as the hues that tinge,
The sweet but fragile flowers.

Yes, these alas! are the dismal scenes,
The day-god's beams must see,
As they light a world, whose countless throng
Move on to dread eternity.

But thou, O! radiant gem canst shine,
Where the brow for aye doth wear,
The smile that ne'er is chased away
By the gloomy shade of care.

In truth, the dwellers 'neath thy beams,
May call thee "holy star"
Let me who live in sorrowing climes,
Know one that's holier far.

It rises above sin's darkest cloud,
Its rays with soft lustre shine,
And gild each shadow of the soul,
With light and peace divine.

And when o'er death's dark stream we're borne,
As our breasts its torrents span,
Faith lifts her eye, and the waves grow calm,
'Neath the "star of Bethlehem."

The Music-Master.—A Tale of France.

"Extensive sale of Objects of Curiosity. Pictures, Books, Clocks, and other Furniture, the property of a lady lately deceased."

Such was the announcement in Galignani's Messenger, which first struck my eye as I sat listlessly looking out of the reading-room window in the Rue Vivienne, alternately glancing at the journal I have mentioned and the heavy drops of rain, as they pattered against the panes of glass. Inwardly, I had been drawing a comparison between my present situation and that of the gentleman similarly situated and graphically described by Washington Irving. As far as actual position was concerned, I yielded without hesitation to the stout gentleman, for he had, at least a flock of ducks to watch and observe; whereas in the court-yard of Monsieur Galignani, not even a blade of grass showed itself, to break the monotony of the scene.

It may seem strange that in a gay metropolis like Paris, where every one confessedly resorts for amusement, I should thus feel lone and dull, puzzled—awfully puzzled—how to kill time, yet many an English traveller, I feel confident, will bear me out, that nothing is so solitary, so care-begetting, as the conciousness of being an utter stranger, "unknowing and unknown," in a large and populous city.

The words, however, I had just read, at once struck out a new path of pleasure for me to tread. Many men love attending auctions; many go to them without any desire to purchase, for the mere delight of gazing at the exciting scene; but none ever, I believe, liked lounging in one of these marts as well as myself. None could ever have been more anxious to increase his cabinet of virtu than myself. None was ever more delighted at the idea of the amusement he was about to share in than was I, when I came to the advertisement in question; so, quickly putting on my hat, and placing my cane under my arm, in the true John Bull style, I hastily quitted the room, and calling for a cab, was, in less than ten minutes, safely landed at the auctions rooms in the Rue ——.

Here was a scene for a philosopher to analyze; the cool, the cunning dealer, the anxious virtuoso, the eager female, and the careless idler, the rich, the poor, the humble, and the proud—all brought to a common level by a desire to possess some article of furniture, or, like myself, to kill time.—The pretty grisette, ogling, coyly attempting to avoid the very glances she seeks; the looks of anger exhibited by those who were outbid, and the quiet triumph of the happy purchasers—all combined to afford a rich treat, for I forgot to tell my readers that I am a great studier of the Book of Nature, I do not endeavor to trace the character of the heart to which it serves as a title-page.—In short I am a sort of peripatetic philosopher, whose first principle is founded on a trite line of Pope, which tells us that

"The proper study of mankind is man."

But as I have very little to do with the story I am about to relate, I will at once plunge into my subject.

One of the first objects offered for sale after my entrance, was an old piano, an instrument so utterly worthless, that I was not a little astonished at hearing a sharp competition suddenly arise, and the hitherto monotonous tone of the auctioneer—the slow bidding repeated by him— in a moment pour forth with a volubility which would not have disgraced many of our first rate sons of the hammer

In French auctions it is customary for the actual worth of every lot to be publicly stated by a sworn appraiser as the object is put up for sale. The piano had thus been valued at one hundred and fifty francs, ; the chances were that it would, of course, be sold considerably under that sum

"One hundred and eighty!" cried a merchant opposite to me, evidently drawn on to this exorbitant bid by opposition.

"O e hundred and eighty five!" echoed close to my ear.

The tone in which this sum was named, made me turn toward the speaker. The evident emotion with which the words were uttered, instantly aroused my curiosity.

"One hundred and ninety! One hundred and ninety-five!"

"Two hundred!" roared out the now maddened dealer: "two hundred!"

"Two hundred!" repeated the auctioneer. "Will any one bid any more? It is against you, sir," added he, speaking in a tone of soft insinuation, turning to the young man beside me.

"Two hundred and— I Great heaven! I cannot! I have not got it!" as the auctioneer knocked down the article to the dealer, I saw the young man, after casting a look of almost despair at the instrument he seemed so highly to prize, turn away, and with a tear in his eye, approach the door.

I am a little bit of a philanthropist, as well as a philosopher. The young man's evident agitation—his disappointment—suddenly created in my breast a desire to serve him. From his dress and style, he was certainly an artist, or a musician. His long black hair, curling down his back, clearly denoted this. His dark habiliments bespoke him to be a mourner. His youth, and seeming grief at losing the piano, at once interested me; so, stepping up to him I stammered out something about my regret at seeing him outbid, and tried to console him, by assuring him that the instrument was not worth half the money paid for it.

"I know it, sir I I know it I But I would have given everything I possessed to obtain it."

"Why not then— ?" I paused; the youth eyed me from head to foot; he seemed to be doubting within his own mind whether my questions arose from kindness, or mere curiosity; whether it would be right to reply candidly to a stranger or no. For an instant, he assumed a haughty look of wounded pride, and was about to turn away, when, more properly reading the real motive which urged my question, he suddenly changed his demeanor, and with a look of despair, yet candor, replied: "You would ask me, sir, why I did not continue to bid for an object so prized? I will reply to you without shame. I offered all the money I possessed in the world for it. I had no more, or I would never have allowed another to possess that instrument."

"I beg your pardon; but will you do me the favor to speak to me, in a moment or two, outside the street door; if you will wait for me, I will be with you in less than five minutes."

The stranger bowed, though he seemed rather puzzled at my strange request, complied.

I now hastened back to the auction-room, and passing through the crowd, found the late eager dealer examining, with evident marks of disappointment, his purchase. The heat of opposition had passed away, and he was now curiously reviewing the fruits of the struggle.

"You have made a bad bargain there, my friend!" said I, approaching him.

"Perhaps so," replied he, for no broker ever allows positively that he has made a dear purchase.

"Will you part with it!"

The man looked up—a cunning glance shot from his eye. I at once saw my mistake. From my readiness to take the article off his hands, he again began to think he had made a good bargain; and after a discussion of some minutes, only ceded the piano to me at a profit of fifty francs—though I really believe he would have gladly given half that sum to have got any one to relieve him from it ten minutes before.

The bargain concluded, and the money paid, I hastened out to the young stranger. When I told him what I had done, I thought he would have embraced me. Never did I see joy so clearly, so warmly expressed. He poured forth his gratitude in terms I should be ashamed to record. He begged and prayed me to tell him how he could repay me. As to the money, he hoped soon to be able to refund it; but my kindness—never, never could he repay that. I was his best friend on earth: I was, in fact—but I see no use in telling all he said. Suffice it to add, I assured him all I asked in return was his motive for thus desiring to possess an apparently worthless piano.

"It is a long story—a harrassing one; but I will tell it you.'

"Will you come and lunch with me? Desire the instrument to be sent home to your lodgings, and return with me to Meurice's."

He instantly agreed. After the meal, he thus related his story;—

"I am the son of respectable parents. Plunged into a ruinous lawsuit by the misconduct of one of his nearest relations, my father found his pecuniary affairs so dreadfully embarassed, that he determined on bringing me up as a music-master. In my earliest years, I had ever displayed a taste for the art, and on the very instrument you saw this day I first learned to play. The acquirement was then intended as an accomplishment, but when, subsequently, my parents fell into poverty, it became my only means of subsistence. There is no passion which more ardently increases than the love of music. Each day my study became more pleasing, and as I overcame each difficulty, a desire to encounter more obstacles hourly sprang up in my breast. In a word, I applied myself so diligently, and with such success, that I was fortunate enough to carry off the first prize of the Conserratoire, for my execution of Thalberg's "Moise." My delight at this fortunate circumstance only served to make the art I professed more dear to me. My parents soon afterward died, and I was left alone in the world, to shift for myself.

"Thanks to good fortune, rather than to my particular merit, I found plenty of scholars, and I already began to think of realizing a future competence, when I was recommended, as a musical instructor, to Mademoiselle d'Olbreuse, an orphan heiress, who resided with an uncle, to whose guardianship she had been committed, in the Faubourg Saint Germain.

"Agatha d'Olbreuse, sir, was a divine creature; I can scarcely believe that she was ever designed for this world. So perfect in every way—in mind, in talent; in person, equally gifted. She was one of the few beings whom we see, and cannot designate otherwise than as an angel.—You will pardon my raptures, you will, perhaps, blame them; but they are only just tributes to the to the worth of one now in heaven; and the youth paused for a moment, but, checking his emotion, he hurriedly continued:—"It may readily be imagined, that such a being soon became my best pupil. Indeed, I have no hesitation in saying she soon excelled her master.

"I am now about to confess my folly, my presumption—were there a stronger expression I would make use of it—to express my hardihood. I fell desperately in love with Agatha, and she from pity, I can scarcely believe it could be otherwise, condescended to reciprocate the feeling.—Oh how we loved! Our looks must have betrayed us, for there was a deep devotion seated in our souls, which must have been expressed in our eyes. When interrupted in our moments of mutual confession of affection by visitors or by members of the family, then would we together hang over the piano, the same piano you have this day purchased for me (for she had expressed a desire to learn on the very instrument by which I had acquired my musical fame), and in melting melody express those outpourings of love which we did not dare to utter.

"Agatha had promised to become my wife, but, alas! she was only nineteen, and the two years which must intervene before she could be a free agent, seemed to us an age. A few weeks only of this period had elapsed, when Monsieur Roy, her uncle, discovered our attachment, and considering, with great justice, that his neice was entitled to a better match, banished me the house, threatening to remove Agatha from France, if she did not instantly consent to give her promise never to see me without his leave. I induced her to give this pledge, and we separated, hoping soon to meet again under happier circumstances. To keep up, however, a kind of correspondence, to express, even when distant the sympathy of our souls, we agreed daily, at a certain hour, to play a particular air—a touching ballad I had taught her, on the piano. For the purpose, I left her the one which I now repossess, and whose cords have so often vibrated to the tender sorrows of my adored Agatha. Already I knew the period had arrived which would bring freedom to her, and happiness to myself, and only waited her summons, to throw myself at her feet, when one morning, to my great surprise, a servant of M. Roy's entered my breakfast-room. He requested me to follow him to his master. I did so. On our way, he informed me that Agatha, my Agatha, was dying!"

For a few moments the young artist paused, overcome with grief; becoming at length more calm, with an effort he continued.

"In her last moments she had desired to see me, and I was now sent for to take leave of her. How can I ever paint the scene which met my view as I entered the chamber where all I loved was about to be snatched from me, or the feelings which then shook my breast? I will hurry over it.

"On her bed, evidently in the last stage of rapid consumption, lay my once lovely and blooming Agatha, more pale than Parian marble.

"As I entered, she attempted to raise her head, but alas! she was already too powerless to do so. Her relations and friends—or rather fiends, for they had brought her to this by their cruelty—made way for me to approach her. I did so; and kneeling down, I kissed her cold hand, as I presently offered up a prayer to Heaven to receive her soul.

"In an instant, a languid smile played upon her angelic features, and, pointing to my piano, which stood open in the room, she expressed by signs (for her voice was completely gone) a desire that I should touch it.

"I flew to it, and with feelings of grief beyond description, I played over the melancholy air we had agreed upon as the record of our feelings. My heart seemed to respond to every note, and I could almost fancy I heard her voice in every note. Suddenly a chord rudely and loudly gave way—at that instant Agatha's pure soul took its eternal flight.

"Can you now wonder that I desire to possess an instrument whose every note seems to breathe her voice—our mutual friend—our only confidant? I heard that the property of Agatha was to be sold, in order to be divided between her relations. This it was which prevented my hitherto leaving Paris. I have waited now six months for the moment when I could purchase the only object on earth dear to me. Imagine then sir, how grateful I must feel to you, who have enabled me to obtain the only treasure I desire to possess in this world."

After a few common attempts on my part to console him, the young artist arose, and assuring me I should see him again before he left Paris, took up his hat and quitted me.

The next morning I was sitting before my fire in the act of reading several letters I had received from England, when my new friend and protege rushed in. I expressed my surprise at seeing him return so soon.

"Ah, sir, 'tis to you I owe all. I knew that my Agatha wished me to possess that piano. It ran as follows:

"'Surrounded in my last moments by persons who have hitherto never shown me esteem or affection, well aware of their sordid views, I only dare confide my last will and testament to this my long-cherished piano.

"'I hereby give and bequeath to Henri Aubriot, professor of music, in return for the sincere love he has ever evinced for me, everything which I now, or which I may ever have been entitled to possess.

"'I pardon my guardian for having attempted to force me into a marriage repugnant to my feelings, because I believe he sincerely thought it to be for my advantage.

"'Lastly, I beseech the person into whose hands this document may fall, to publish and make known this my last will.

"'Made and dated two days after becoming twenty-one years of age.

"'12th Dec., 1840. Agatha D'Olbreuse.'"

The artist whose story I have here narrated, and whose history I have given under the name of Aubriot, is now the celebrated ——

But no, it is not fair to give his real appellation.

Early Hours of Labor.—We have always been in favor of shortening the hours of labor, and closing stores early, in order to give clerks and mechanics the benefits of evening study and instruction. If they do not achieve it in that way, how are they to acquire knowledge, when and where are they to cultivate the mind and improve the faculties? They understand these things in England, and improve upon the understanding.—There the Mechanics who have improved their time, can rise in the world. One of the leading Editors of the Western Review, and the most brilliant writer of the age, was a cooper. One of the principal Editors of a London daily journal was a baker; one of the best reporters of the London Times was a stone mason; one of the most eloquent Ministers in London, was a blacksmith; Joseph Hume was a sailor, and then an apothecary. There is an army of working men now holding high intellectual positions in England. So have many great Americans sprang from ploughboys and mechanics, but they have had time to improve themselves—leisure to cultivate their minds. This is what our clerks, our apprentices, our laborers want. They ought not to labor from dawn until late at night—they are jaded and fatigued, they become exhausted, and have no strength or inclination for study.—Organ.

THE LORD SENT IT, IF THE DEVIL BROUGHT IT.—There resided in my neighborhood a poor widow, whose means of support were exceedingly limited. Between nursing herself for rheumatism, and spinning and knitting, most of her lonely time passed. I am ashamed to say, that on one or two occasions I joined some wild young chaps in playing off tricks upon her, such as making unusual noises about the house at night, smoking her almost to death by putting a board over the top of her low mud-built chimney, and such like doings, that we thought rare sport, but for which we deserved a little wholesome chastisement, if there had been any one authorized to administer it.

One night, soon after dark, it happened that I was returning home in company with a merry fellow about my own age, and had to go by old Granny Bender's cottage. I had been in the town, and was bringing home a couple of 'Baker's loaves,' of which some of our folks were as fond as city people are of getting now and then a good taste of country 'home made.'

'Tom,' said I, as the old woman's cottage came in sight at a turn of the road, 'suppose we have a little fun with Granny Bender?'

'Agreed,' was Tom's answer, for he was always ready for sport.

We had not fully decided upon what we would do, when we came up to the cottage, and paused to settle our mode of annoyance. The only light within was the dim flickering of a few small sticks burning on the hearth. As we stood near the window, listening to what was going on inside, we found that Granny was praying, and a little to our surprise asking for food.

'As she expects to get food from heaven,' said I, irreverently, 'I suppose she will have to be accommodated.'

And turning from the window, I clambered up noiselessly to the top of her chimney—a feat of no great difficulty—and tumbled my two loaves down.

When I reached the window again, in order to see what effect this mode of supply would have upon Granny Bender, I found the good old creature on her knees, piously thanking God for having answered her prayer.

'That's cool,' said I to Tom, 'now isn't it?'

'I rather think it is,' repied Tom.

'And is the old woman really such a fool as to think that the Lord answered her prayer, and sent her well baked loaves of bread down the chimney?'

'No doubt of it.'

'It won't do to let her labor under the mistake? no, never in the world,' said I.

'Hallo, Granny!' and I threw open the window, and pushed my laughing face into the room.

She had risen from her knees, and was about putting a piece of bread into her mouth.

'Now, Granny Bender!' said I, 'it isn't possible that you believed that bread came from heaven? Why you old sinner, you, I threw it down the chimney.'

By this time the old woman's countenance was turned fully towards me, and by the dim light of the feeble fire, I could see there were tears of thankfulness upon her faded and withered face.—The expression of that face did not in the least change, though there were a deep rebuke in the tones of her voice, as well as in the words she uttered, as she said—

'The Lord sent it, if the devil brought it!'

You may be sure that I vanished instanter, while Tom clapped his hands and shouted,

'Good! good! too good! oh dear! but the old lady was too much for you that time!' with sundry other expressions of like tenor.

I tried to laugh with him as he went home, and did laugh, perhaps, as loud as he did, but somehow or other, the laugh didn't appear to do me any good.

After that I let Granny Bender alone.—Phila. Saturday Courier.

A Wonderful Phenomenon.

From the Detroit Daily Advertiser.

A singular phenomenon was brought to light a week ago yesterday, in the township of Greenfield, about eight miles from this city. The facts are very nearly as follows. The Messrs. Grangers in boring to find water to supply their saw mill, sunk a four inch hole to the depth of 70 feet, when they struck a vein, or cavity. As they withdrew the augur from the hole, to their great surprise, it was followed by a violent current of air, that threw up stones as large as hen's eggs, ten or fifteen feet high. For a few moments, when the hole was first opened, the air was accompanied by a stream of water, which was thrown ten or twelve feet high. The water, however, soon ceased coming, and the air gushed out with such force that the roar could be distinctly heard fifty or sixty rods distant. On touching fire to the air, it caught, and the flames flashed twenty feet high, and came near burning the building, covering the machinery in which it is located.

They finally succeeded with considerable difficulty in stopping it, by forcing down blankets, and driving a spile into the hole, which was their only means of stopping the air or gas, and extinguishing the flames. For several moments after the hole was stopped, the earth trembled and shook for some distance around, as though an eruption was about to take place. The people, who by this time had gathered to the number of about a hundred, were greatly alarmed at these symptoms, and scattered with all possible rapidity, supposing that "Millerism" was about coming to a focus, or that they were about to be blown up sky high by an earthquake. From the time it was opened till it was thus closed, was about six hours, and the air gushed out all of the time with unabated force.

It has been opened several times since with the same effect. The power and force of the air does not seem to diminish in the least. The Messrs. Grangers are proposing to secure it with apparatus so as to shut it off and let it out at leisure, and test its real qualities. The people in that vicinity are all confident now, that it can be conveyed here in pipes, and successfully used for lighting the city with gas, from this great natural, underground Gasometer. We learn that several scientific gentlemen of this city intend visiting it soon.

Our Country.

From the Gentleman's Magazine for June, 1848.

Land of broad rivers, and of ocean-lakes,
Sky-kissing cliffs, and prairies prank'd with flowers,
That seated on thy mountain-throne, dost hear
The Atlantic and Pacific's clamoring surge,
Battling against thy coast, and throw to each
Thy snow-white sails, that visit every clime,
And kindred under Heaven. Fair Land! Free Land!
How glorious art thou.

Mid thy cultur'd vales
The sturdy reapers sing, garnering the corn
That feedeth other realms, beside their own.
—Toil lifts his brawny arm, and takes the wealth
That makes his children princes—Learning wins
By studious lamp, the better gold, that dreads
Nor rust, nor rubber's wile—Art deftly brings Tissue, and tinture—and the fretted stone:—
Strange steeds of iron, with their ceaseless freight
Tramp night and day—while the red lightning bears
Thy slightest whisper on its wondrous wing.—
—Proudly thou spread'st thine eagle-pinion o'er
The exil'd, and the crush'd from every clime,
Giving them welcome; may no vulture beak
Transpierce thee for thine hospitality,
But sons of strangers build thy walls, and call
Thy gates—salvation.

'Neath thy lofty dome
'Tis good to linger, where in conclave high,
Convene the chosen from thy many States,
Sages, and men of eloquence, who stretch
Their line of travel through an Empire's length
To pour their wisdom at thy shrine, and make Thy union perfect. From the wind-swept hills,
To where the rich Magnolio drinks the breath
Of fervid suns—from the great, beating heart
Of the young, giant West, to where the East
Wrinkled with thought, doth nurse a Nation's mind,
They come, to do thee honor. There, to list
The grave debate, or catch the kindling thrill
With which impassioned eloquence maintains Thine equal laws, inspires the ardent prayer
Of patriot love, that God would hold thee safe,
And firmly knit thy children's hearts, to share
One home—one destiny.

A mighty wind
Doth shake the palaces of ancient time,
And voices 'mid the despot thrones are heard,
Crying as in Jerusalem of old,
"Let us depart!" But thou, my blessed Land—
Like some fair hearth, which hovering angels guard,
Gather thine offspring round thee, and make bright
Their hallow'd chain of love. Warn them to bear
Each other's burdens—seek the common good,
Be pitiful to error, and repress
Each ruder breath that stirs to wrathful deeds.

Oh, beautiful and glorious! thou dost wrap
The robes of Liberty around thy breast,
And as a matron watch thy little ones
Who from their cradle seek the village school,
Bearing the baptism on their infant brow
Of Christian faith and knowledge, like the bud
That at the bursting of its sheath, doth feel
Pure dews, and heavenward turn.

There is thy strength,
In thy young children, and in those who lead
Their souls to righteousness. The mother's prayer
With her sweet lisper, ere it sinks to rest—
The faithful teacher 'mid a plastic group—
The classic halls—the hamlet's slender spire
From whence, as from the solemn Gothic pile
That crowns the city's pomp—ascendeth sweet
Jehovah's praise—these are thy strength, my Land!
These are thy hope.

Oh! lonely Ark, that rid'st
A tossing deluge, dark with History's wrecks,
And pav'd with dead who made not Heaven their help,
God keep thee perfect in thy many parts,
Bound in one living whole.

Hartford, Conn., May 10th, 1848.

Incidents of a Day's Excursion.

One day last summer I took my place in a Gravesend Steamer, and found considerable amusement in watching the various characters. Two persons in particular attracted my notice; one was a middle aged gentlemen, stout, rather surly, taciturn, who paid no attention to any living being on board, except a huge Newfoundland dog, that was panting or lolling out his tongue, or roamed among the passengers, shoving them out of his way, frightening children by suddenly covering their faces with one lick of his great tongue, and convincing nervous ladies that he was going mad by the vigor with which he stuck out his legs while rolling on his back upon the deck. His master eyed these pranks with a sly smile, and seemed quietly to enjoy the terror occasioned by the antics of his burly friend.

The other person whom I especially noticed, was a very pretty and well-dressed lady. Young lady she would no doubt have been called, but that she had with her a little girl, about seven years old, who called her "mamma." She was evidently possessed of nerves. Indeed, she seemed to be possessed by them, and their name was Legion. Endless were the petty annoyances in which they involved her. But her keenest sufferings in this small way were caused by the unwieldly gambols of Lion, the Newfoundland dog; and her incessant and puerile exclamations of terror, indignation, and spite, against the good-natured brute, kept up the sly malicious smile upon the lips of his apparently unnoticing master.—The little girl, on the contrary, had, to the increased alarm of the weak mother, made friends with the monster; and for a long time amused herself by throwing bits of biscuit for him to catch, which feat, notwithstanding the incorrectness of her aim, he managed to accomplish, by making a boisterous plunge to one side or the other; and when at last she timidly offered him a piece out of her hand, and he acknowledged the compliment by licking her face and rubbing his side against her till he almost pushed her down, the little creature fairly screamed with delight. Her mother screamed too, but in one of the small hysterical screams in which she was fond of indulging, and was followed by an outburst of anger at Lion's audacity.

"Good gracious!" she exclaimed, "if that horrid creature should be mad he'll have killed my child! And how dirty he is, too! Look at your pelisse, Adeline; see what state it is in! How dare you play with that dirty animal?"

This transition from hydrophobia to a soiled dress was too much for Lion's master, and he burst into a long and loud laugh.

"I wish sir," said the lady, snappishly, "that you would call away that nasty dog, instead of setting him on to annoy everybody who is not accustomed to have such dirty animals about them."

The gentleman said nothing, but bowed and walked forward; and I soon after saw him enjoying a cigar, while Lion played the agreeable in his own rough fashion to people who knew how to read the expression of his honest and intelligent physiognomy.

Little Adeline, deprived of the attraction which had fixed her attention to the inside of the boat, began to see amusement in watching the foaming water as it rushed from the paddle-wheels, and danced in long lines behind them. She knelt on a shawl which a fellow passenger had kindly lent as a cushion for her little knees, and leaned quietly over the side watching the roaring water; so her mother was for a time relieved from the thousand mosquito-winged vexations which had hitherto beset her.

We were within a few miles of Gravesend.—The tide was just at the full, and the broad expanse of the river lay around us in all its majesty: and to those who have never beheld the Hudson or the Mississippi, old Father Thames is majestic; ay, and if we place in the balance the historic, political, and commercial importance of the transactions of which his broad breast is and has been the highway, our "time honored" river will not lose in dignity even when compared with those giant floods of the West.

Such thoughts as these, however, did not trouble Adeline's pretty head, which began, I could see, to grow giddy with the continual whirl beneath her. A large seaweed that was dashed from the paddle-wheel caught her attention. It sank, then rose, turned round in a short eddy, and then darted out in the long wake that was left behind the steamer. She leaned forward to watch its progress, farther, farther still her little neck was stretched; she lost her balance, and toppled over into the roaring flood. In a moment all was confusion on board. Men were shouting for ropes and boats, to stop the steamer; cries of "a child overboard!" "who can swim?" and a thousand other cries and questionings; but above all, were the poor mother's heart-rending shrieks, too painfully in earnest now; and she alone, in the fond instinctive devotion of maternal love, that even could she reach her child she could only sink with her, endeavoring to leap into the water to save her.

Suddenly Lion, followed closely by his master, came tearing along the deck, knocking the people to right and left like ninepins. They sprang into the boat that hung at the stern, everybody giving way before the determined energy of both man and dog. Lion looked anxiously in his master's face, and uttered a short low bark.

"Wait," said the latter in reply; "where was she seen last?"

"There, sir," replied a sailor promptly, "there, beside that piece of plank?"

"How often has she risen?"

"Twice."

The gentleman drew a long breath, and said to his dog in a low tone "look out!"

And Lion did look out, with wild flashing eyes, and limbs that trembled with anxiety. What a moment that was! Every one else was passive; every other attempt was laid aside, and all stood in mute expectation; those who were near enough watching the third rising of the poor child, and those who could not see the water keeping their eyes fixed upon Lion. In another instant a cry was raised; as a golden-tressed head was seen to emerge from the water. The noble dog had seen her first though, and ere the warning cry had reached his ears he had dashed from the boat with wonderful rapidity and was swimming towards the little sufferer as though he knew that life and death depended on his efforts.

His master marked his progress anxiously.—His face was pale as death, and it was only by rigidly compressing them that he could control the nervous quivering of his lips. "He has her!" he exclaimed as Lion rose to the surface after a long dive, holding the little Adeline by the hair of the head in such a manner that her face was out of the water. "He has her, and she is saved!" Down went the steps, and on them stood a couple of active sailors, encouraging the brave dog by shouts and gestures, and ready to receive his precious burthen when he should approach them.—Slowly he came on, wistfully eyeing the steps, and now and then looking up at his master, who was leaning over the side, and encouraging him with his well-known voice.

"Here you are!" cried the sailors, seizing the little girl. She was handed from one to another, and at last deposited in the arms of an active looking gentleman, whom every body seemed instinctively to recognise as a surgeon, and by him carried below.

"Now, come up, there's a brave fellow!" said the sailor, retreating to make way for Lion to climb up the steps. But the poor creature whined piteously, and after one or two fruitless attempts to raise himself out of the water, he remained quite passive.

"Help him—help him! He is exhausted!" cried his master, fighting his way through the crowd, to go to the rescue of his brave favorite.—By the time, however, that he had reached the top of the ladder the sailors had pereived the condition of the dog, and with some difficulty dragged him from the water. With their assistance he crawled feebly up; and languidly licked his master's hand, and stretched himself on the deck.

It would be difficult to tell which received the most attention—the little girl under the hands of the surgeon and all the women, who had squeezed themselves into the cabin under the firm conviction that they were exceedingly useful, or the noble dog from the kind but rough attentions of the steamer's men, under the superintendence of his master.

Both the invalids were convalescent; and Lion was sitting up, receiving with quiet dignity the caresses of his frieds, when Adeline's mother came running up stairs; and throwing herself upon her knees before him, and clasping him affectionately in her arms, laid her cheeks upon his rough head and wept.

"He's a dirty animal, madam," said the gentleman, who could not forget her former slighting remarks. "He'll make your pelisse in such a state! Besides, he may be mad!"

She cast up her eyes with an expression of meek reproach. They were very fine eyes, and I think he felt it, for his features softened immediately.

"Oh, pray, pray, give him to me!" she began.

"Give Lion to you, he exclaimed in derision. "Why, what would you do with him? I will tell you. You'd pet and pamper the poor beast till he was eaten up with disease, and as nervous as a fine lady. No, no; you'd better give little Adeline to me Lion and I could take much better care of her than you can."

"Perhaps so, sir," she replied, with the gentle manner that had come over her since the accident; "but still I could not spare her. She is my only child and I a widow."

"I must go," muttered the gentleman to himself. "Whew! a widow! Has not the immortal WELLER assured us that one widow is equal to twenty-five ordinary women? It's not safe—morally safe—to be in the same boat with her."

He walked away. But who may wrestle against fate? When the boat returned to London Bridge, I saw him carrying Adeline ashore, with the pretty widow leaning on his arm. They had a long conversation all the way home! and when he had put them into a cab they had another chat through the window, terminating with a promise to "COME EARLY." What could all this mean? He looked after the cab till it was out of sight.

"I think she has got rid of her nerves," he observed to himself. "What a charming creature she is without them!"

Mr. Palmer, late of Indiana, who has explored the country north of the Columbia river, says, that Vancouver's Island is as large as Great Britain, and contains all the natural resources to make it the seat of empire of a great nation.

THE CATHEDRAL OF PUEBLA.—The following graphic description of one of the many magnificent churches in Mexico, is from the correspondence of the Courier & Enquirer:

Yesterday I paid an early visit to the Cathedral, and as that is the mammoth of the large family of churches in this city, you must be content with a slight description of it alone. It is the most magnificent and imposing building I have yet seen.—It is built of a dark-grey porphyry, and occupies the west side of the Plaza. There are two towers at each angle of the front, behind which, on the same line, and near the centre, are two domes, and in the centre, near the foot of the church, is another dome exceeding considerably in altitude the others. The roofs of the domes are of variously collored mosaic. The left tower, from the weight of the material, has sunk, and perceptibly leant from the perpendicular. Niches, both in front and on the sides of the church, are occupied by full length marble statues of the apostles, remarkably well executed. The hight of the towers is nearly 100 feet, and in these towers are fifty very finely toned bells, which make a deafening sound when rung. It is the interior of the Cathedral, however, that strikes the visitor with surprise, and almost a sensation of awe. It is a grand, imposing edifice. There are three aisles supported by immense fluted porphry columns: the ceiling is composed of grained arches, and is very high; between each column on the side aisles, there are rich altars, shut off by open iron work gates gilded with gold. There are six altars on each side, ten at the head and ten at the foot, and one near the centre of the building, composed entirely of the different marbles of the country, inlaid with solid gold. It is a temple within a temple. There are double rows of concentric Corinthian columns supporting the exterior dome, built also of solid marble. In the interior there was once a figure of the Virgin Mary in solid gold, worth three millions of dollars. Santa Anna carried it off, ostensibly for the good of the people, really for the benefit of his own pocket. In the front of this temple is the altar. As you enter the church for one-third way down the centre aisle is enclosed, excepting the face towards the foot of the church; in the interior along the sides are ovens, containing the remains of the several archbishops who have died since the foundation of the church, which was completed in 1666; on the top of this enclosure are two immense, highly ornamented organs. Every nook and corner of the church was filled with choice paintings set in magnificent gold frames, and in parts not occupied thus, it is one mass of elaborate gold gilt carving. In one of the niches there are several busts of archbishops; the busts are hollow, and each contains the skull, head, or some patt of the illustrious individual, which is visible through the glass ser in the bust. About the centre of one of the side aisles is a perspective view of the interior of a cathedral. which is very perfect. In one of the aisles you can see some of the marble cubes of the floor have been taken up and replaced with new ones. Under this repose the remains of the consort of the illustrious Santa Anna. All the ornaments, carvings, &c., of the cathedral are exquisitely beautiful, and give evidence of refined taste and cunning workmanship. Every thing looks rich, yet not the least gaudy.

I had the boldness to ascend to the top of the tower, and for me a bold undertaking it was.—The ascent is up a narrow stone spiral stair case, confined in a very small tower. On one of the landings the bell ringer's family lived quite comfortably in two rooms. I thought I never would reach the top, but once there, I was amply repaid for my trouble. The whole city was at my feet, every building could be distinctly seen, and the view of the plain beyond is very extensive. It was a curious sight, looking over the tops of the buildings: they are all flat with tile roofs, and the arch which they all have, is continued to the top of the house, and reminds one, with the arches and pillars of the porch below, of a child's pasteboard house. A funeral of a dragoon passed along while I was at this commanding height; the solemn tones of the dead march mingled with the chime of bells, made it very impressive. The height is so great, that the market people in the plaza looked like little children, and in running about looked like a troop of ants. Every church in the city could be seen, and their number, I believe, is computed at 80. You may imagine the number of bells; there cannot be less than 1500. It is the most priest-ridden community in Mexico. When I reached terra firma I thought my legs would certainly break off.

ALARM LOCK.—An ingenious Yankee has invented a machine which is destined to come into universal use. It consists of the attachment of a cheap, simple and durable alarm to a lock of almost any description, so arranged as not to interfere in any respect with the action of the lock, and so connected with the bolt, that the latter cannot be withdrawn, or even the attempt made, without giving an alarm, at once distinct and sufficient to awaken any person in the vicinity, and which may be distinctly heard at the distance of 20 or 25 rods.

The expense of this lock is no more than those in use, and it can be applied to the common lock; the improvement will no doubt be soon applied to almost every lock that is manufactured.—Farmer & Mechanic.

SOMETHING IN LOOKS.—A man's look is the work of years. It is stamped on his countenance by the events of his whole life—nay more, the hand of nature, and it is not to be got rid of easily. —There is, as it has been remarked repeatedly, something in a person's appearance at first sight which we do not like, and which gives us an odd twinge, but which is overlooked in a multitude of other circumstances till the mask is taken off, and we see this lurking character verified in the plainest manner in the sequel. We are struck at first, and by chance, with what is peculiar and characteristic. Also, with permanent traits and general effects. These afterwards go off in a set of unmeaning, common-place details. This sort of prima facie evidence, then, shows what a man is, better than what he says or does—for it shows us the habit of his mind, which is the same under all circumstances and disguises.—Hazlitt.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION OF GAS.—In St. Louis last Wednesday evening, three loud explosions, like explosions of gunpowder, were heard in a four-story stone building on the levee, occupied by J. & W. Finney. The building was very much injured from the foundation to the roof.—Upon inquiry the explosions were found to have been caused by the building becoming filled with gas from a breakage of the pipe in the street. Of the three persons in the building, two were thrown into the street without being much hurt, but the other, a German, was shockingly burned and lacerated.—Louisville Jour.

THE COD FISHERY.—We are happy to learn, says the St. John's (Newfoundland) Royal Gazette, of the 30th May, that intelligence has been received in town, that the Cod fishery to the Southward and Westward, has been prosecuted so far with unusual success.

Geraldine.

Along yon lonely pathway by the shore
Where sounding waters dash tumultuously,
Pale Geraldine moves musing silently
Upon the days and woes of heretofore.
The thought of him who unto her was more
Than life itself, comes soft and dreamily
Upon her heart—a thought exceedingly
And sadly sweet she loves to linger o'er
Those woes become in time joy-bringers dear
Clad in a sober livery, and we greet
Them as companions of the days of old
Who in our sympathy were sharers sweet,
Who dwelt within our hearts most secret fold
Searching yet soothing—thus e'er would we have them near.

Profane Swearing.

This a practice and evil of common occurrence. Scarcely a day passes but that we hear the name of God profaned, alike in high places and low, among the wealthy and the poor. Our ears are saluted with profanity from the grey-headed man, the middle aged, the youth, and even from the little boys in our streets. Nor is it confined exclusively to males, it is sometimes permitted to disgrace and blacken female character. But why should individuals indulge in it? Are there any considerations which commend it? None; but there are many which condemn it; we will mention a few.

First—It is a useless habit. It has never done any one good, but often done him injury, and made him ashamed of himself. It has never added to one's honor, influence, wealth, peace, or happiness. It does not strengthen, but rather weakens an individual's character for veracity. A man of known truth does not need to confirm his statements by constant oaths, and one who does do it, awakens by that very means the suspicion that he may not be strictly a man of truth.

Again—It is a practice which shows a want of due respect to others. The profane swearer is frequently in the company of those who disapprove of the practice, and whose chaste and proper conversation is disturbed and whose hearts are pained by his profanity. A man has no right to disturb and annoy his fellow by a useless, much less by a vicious practice or habit: it is not treating him with proper respect. If men will swear, let them swear with swearers, and not offend the ears and pain the hearts of the virtuous by their profanity. It is rude and disrespectful to them to indulge in it in their presence.

Again—It is a coarse and ungentlemanly practice. It always indicates coarse and unchaste feelings. The profane swearer, however strong may be his pretensions to refinement, is proved coarse by this vulgar and sinful habit. It is a trait of the lowest and most abandoned in society, the dialect of the grog-shop, the gaming-house, the brothel, and every place that is vile, and of all that are low, filthy, and corrupt. He that indulges in it, so far proves his relationship to the vulgar and the vile. Weak minds may suppose it a mark of manliness and gentility, but they are egregiously mistaken. Is the profane man entitled to the claim of a gentleman? a gentleman is a man of good breeding, a man raised by his character above the vulgar. Is the profane swearer such a man? What parent would teach profanity to his child? What school would teach it as an accomplishment? What scientific lecturer, moralist, or preacher, would be tolerated, who should constantly confirm his statements by oaths, and indulge in profanity before the public assembly? What person of gentlemanly feeling will indulge in it in the parlor, in the presence of refined and intelligent ladies?

Again—It is unreasonable and ridiculous. It is a common practice with unbelievers and those who are skeptical concerning the doctrines of revelation to indulge in profanity. What propriety or consistency is there in a man, who denies the existence of a God or the immortality of the soul, calling upon Deity in oaths and imprecations? His profanity denies his creed. So, what propriety in a man who disbelieves in a hell, cursing and damning his fellow? Dumb beasts and even inanimate objects are not unfrequently made the objects of imprecation and cursing: now what reason is there in calling upon God to curse and damn that which has neither soul nor moral character, perhaps not life itself! Is it not ridiculous in the extreme?

Again—It is a sin of no trifling magnitude. It is a violation of the express and specific command of Jehovah. It is indulged in merely to gratify a depraved will, a corrupt heart, and is in open defiance of the Almighty; it directly appeals to him to witness it. What greater indignity can man offer him? His holy name is profaned, and he is treated with contempt to his face. Reader, dost thou swear, art thou profane? Think of the character of thy useless, vulgar, wicked habit, and repent of it, refrain from it. Learn to fear and honor the name of thy Heavenly Father.

MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.—We derive the following information from a late private letter, received in this city from Canton. A few days previous to the date of the letter, three Roman Catholic missionaries arrived at Canton, who had been seized in one of the Northern provinces. They were sent as prisoners to Canton, where, on Dr. Parker's requesting their liberty, and giving Tsi-Yeng a receipt for them, they were liberated on the 7th of March. They came, says the letter, from their place of confinement to our house, where they remained a few hours and then proceeded to Hong Kong. Two of them were Italians, and one a Spaniard; one of them, Bishop Rizzolati, had resided in the interior 20 years, Bishop Novella 5 years, and Priest Narvoo 3 years. The former conversed in the Mandarin with all the ease and fluency of his native tongue, and it was interesting to see these men and Dr. P.,—all having been born on the other side of the world—using the Chinese language as the medium of communicating with each other, interspersing their conversation with Latin where they could not make themselves clear in the Mandarin. Many of our friends came in to see them, and at one time the Bishop and Dr. P. were engaged in an amicable conversation in Chinese; another speaking first with one, and then another in Spanish and French, and the third with another party still in Italian. They were all most interesting looking men, and in full Chinese costume and flowing beards, were quite imposing in appearance.—Boston. D. Adv.

☞ Raising Celery.—This plant has become quite an object of culture among our gardeners, as well as a favorite with our citizens—many of whom produce it for their own use. The last number of the Horticulturist has some valuable and practical in tructions in relation to raising it, which we copy for the benefit of those who would have the article in perfection :

Having fixed up the ground for my celery patch, I have it well trenched two feet deep with a spade, if it has not been trenched previously. In the trenching, I bury all the best top soil in the bottom of the lower pit, and throw the clayey or gravelly subsoil on the top. The reason for this precedure is obvious. You always set celery plants in a trench. If you take off half the top soil to make this trench, it is evident that you have but a very poor bottom left on which to grow celery. On the other hand, if you make the soil of double the usual depth and put the best soil at the bottom of the two feet, it is placed exactly where it is of most benefit to the roots of the plants; while the poorer subsoil, being on the top, answers equally well to raise about the stalks, in order to blanch them.

Very well; at the 10th of June, then, I mark out my plat of trenched ground into trenches three feet from each other. The trenches themselves should be dug a foot wide and eighteen inches deep. You can scarcely make the soil in them too rich; and I have ascertained by experiment that the celery plant not only likes common stable manure, but is also very fond of bone dust, or horn shavings. I therefore, in preparing the trench, put half a peck of either of these substances to the soil of every fifty feet of trench, and a quart of fine packing salt. Then the whole manure, bone dust, etc., is well incorporated in the soil of the trench to the depth of six or eight inches, and you are ready for the transplanting.

It is best to do this in a dull or cloudy day. But if it is properly done, i. e., with balls of earth to each plant, one day will answer nearly as well as another. In order to accomplish this, the stock, or nursery bed, in which the plants grow in their second stage, must be thoroughly saturated with water two or three hours in advance. Then, with a trowel, take up each plant separately, with a small ball of earth, lay the balls in a sieve or basket, and carry them at once and plant them in the trenches. If it is well done, as it may indeed be with the greatest facility, not one plant in five hundred will fail; and they will scarcely suffer the least check, and will require no shading.

About earthing-up the plants, in order to blanch or whiten the stalks, there is a good deal of difference of opinion; but it is all easily reconciled. If you wish very large plants, you must not commence blanching till the last three or four weeks. If you do not care about the size of the celery, but only the delicacy and crispness of flavor, you must commence earthing-up about the middle of August; doing it frequently, and very little at a time, in fine dry weather.

The two best sorts of celery that I have tried are Seymour's White Solid, and Red Solid. But, after all, I have raised as heavy and as fine plants of the Common White, by the mode here given, as of other of those varieties.

A word or two about keeping celery for winter use, may not be out of place here. Many persons complain of the difficulty of keeping it in the winter—its rotting in the cellar, root-house, etc. The method I have employed for nine years, is a very simple, easy one, and I have never lost a single head of it, though I have raised and kept many thousands. It is as follows: In November, when the frosty weather sets in, and the time for digging the plants comes, choose a high and dry part of the garden in any convenient place; level it, and begin at one side to open a shallow trench, deep enough to lay in the roots of the celery close together, burying them in an inclined position, so as to cover all the blanched part of the stalks—only leaving the green leaves at the top exposed. The next row may be put within three inches of the last, and so on, row inclining upon row, till the whole is laid in. In this compact way, the space required for a large crop will be only a few feet square. This done, cover the whole, as soon as the winter sets in, with two and a half feet of straw, covered with a few bits of wood to keep it down. This will most effectually keep out all frost while the temperature of the soil itself is so low that there can be no decay or change in the plants. At the same time, by removing a portion of the straw on one side, celery may be reached at time during the winter when required.

The Harvest in France.—The Paris National states that, from all quarters, the most satisfactory accounts are received of the state and prospect of the harvest. All the journals of the departments repeat that the "oldest inhabitants," cannot remember a season so favorable to the fruits of the earth. The corn is strong and well advanced, the heads begin to be heavy. The vines are covered with grapes and flowers. The grains are abundant, and already in many parts of the country it has been necessary to mow the artificial prairies where the luzerne, the sain foin and clover begin to suffer from excess of vegetation.

A Beautiful Dream.

I have no joy but in thy smile—
Save in thy frown, no pain;
Come to my side a little while—
I'll never ask again
To see thee, and thy looks to bless—
To hear thee, and thy words adore,
I never dreamed of more than this—
I'll dream of this no more.

I know the idle tale I tell
Will wake no echo in thy breast;
In thy heart's charmed circle-well
I know mine cannot rest.
But thou wert dear from earliest years,
And dearer every day,
And love that's nursed in thought and tears
Cannot be wiled away.

If I could bid my heart be still,
Of what avail were this?
'Twill never cost thine own a thrill
Of anguish or of bliss
'Twill follow thee through life and death,
True guardian by thy side,
Yet never ask a single breath
Of fondness for its guide.

Come to my side a little while—
I'll never ask again;
My heart is sick for one sweet smile—
Hearts should not plead in vain.
Ah! but thine eyes are filled with tears—
They do not turn away:
Thy hand—thy hand—the love of years
Has not been all astray.

Arrival of the Cambria.

By O'Reilly's Western Telegraph.

The Cambria arrived at New York this morning. She sailed on the 27th.

Commercial news unfavorable.

Corn—Market dull. Prices receding.

France.—Great alarm and excitement. The hopes of the moderate party were likely to be defeated by the party favoring the empire.

Louis Napoleon had rekindled the old Bonaparte enthusiasm. Soon as the Government perceived the symptoms, 100,000 troops concentrated at Paris. Disturbances occur nightly. On the 10th 20,000 rioters were hemmed in and made prisoners. Among them were Englishmen, Americans and distinguished women. The assembly at first displayed a noble feeling, eloquently denouncing tyrants and dictators. The popular feeling divided—"Vive Republic" drowned by "Vive le Bonaparte."

On Monday, when it was rumored that Louis had arrived, more than one regiment of the National Guards shouted Vive l'Empereur. Lamartine mounted the Tribune, pale as ashes, demanding restoration of the decree of '32 against Louis. Whilst speaking, shots were fired outside. Shouts Vive l'Empereur.

Lamartine sat down overwhelmed. One National Guard was shot Lamartine was skilful to turn the advantage and said, "First blood shed. Despotism not a Republic." The Decree was then sanctioned by acclamation. The people disputed the Decree and declared Louis should take his seat.

On the 13th, the excitement increased. Barricades were attempted, but the overwhelming military force prevented them. In the evening, the Assembly by a large majority, reversed the decision of the preceding day, and declared Louis admitted to membership. Ledru Rollin opposed the motion, but the majority prevailed, and Rollin immediately resigned, Rumored that Lamartine will follow. A proclamation was issued calling the people to arms, to place Louis on the throne. Wednesday, Paris was quiet—Louis hourly expected. Several commercial houses had failed in Paris.

The Bonaparte leader arrested.

Ireland.—More tranquil since Mitchell's conviction.

Ship Building in New York.—It is mentioned in the New York papers, as a fact strikingly illustrating the change in maritime affairs that steam is effecting, that in that city, so long and justly renowned for the number and excellence of her sailing packets, although the ship yards are all fully employed, there is not one ship on the stocks intended for a sailing vessel. But there are, says the Mirror, ten sea steamers now building, some of which are already launched, and will soon be ready for service. Two are for E. K. Collins's Liverpool line. They are larger than any of the American steamers. There are two for Sloo's line to Chagres; three for Howland & Aspinwall's line of Pacific steamers from Panama; two for the New York and Savannah line; and one, the Franklin, for the Bremen line. The keel of another will shortly be laid to run with the Crescent City to New Orleans; and two more are to be built, to run with the Northerner and Southerner to Charleston, making a semi-weekly line.

We learn from other sources that some of these new steamships in comfort, power, speed, and good seagoing qualities generally, are intended to surpass any thing of the kind afloat. No pains or expense are spared in their construction, and New York steamers will soon be as numerous, and as famous for every desirable quality, as her sailing packets have been. It would be a reproach to the home of Fulton and the proverbial enterpise of Americans, if it were not so.

Mexican Barbarity.—The meanest kind of persecution has already been commenced by the Mexicans against their countrywomen, who have been civil towards our gallant soldiers during their sojourn in that country. The correspondent of the N. O. Crescent says:

"The lower order of the Mexicans, instigated by some of the better informed, have already begun their persecutions towards those who have been friendly or sociable towards the Americans. At Cuernavaca they sacked their houses, and at San Angel, the day General Patterson's division left, they committed great excesses. It is reported that they not only destroyed the furniture of those of the softer sex who received the visits of los Yanquies, but took a number of them to the very trees where Riley and his companions were whipped and branded, and there cut their hair short from the head, and with a hot iron branded the letters "U. S." upon their cheeks. When the news was received in the city, the women who had visited the balls, and danced with our people, were in a great way. They ran off to their houses, eschewed all Yankee company, and knowing that they had been marked for future punishment, commenced making preparations for departure.—Those who had not a particular friend among the Americans were running round the different wagon-yards, and begging the teamsters to take them to Jalapa, Vera Cruz, or to such other place on the road as they might live for a while in safety, and I verily believe they will average two to each wagon that is now on the road. While one cannot but feel sorry for them in their unfortunate position, he cannot but be amused at the earnestness with which they appeal to those who, but a few hours since, were enemies to their country, to take them from their homes. There are, perhaps, no men on earth who are so jealous of any little attentions paid to the ladies of their country by foreigners, as these Mexicans, and to so great an extent does their hatred go to those who return even common civilities, that their conduct is at times beneath the brute creation. Knowing what I do of the men, I am not suprised at the great disposition evinced by a certain class of females to travel."

We regret to announce the loss of another of our steamers. The Speed, belonging to Messrs. Macpherson & Crane, was burnt on Saturday, on the Ottawa, about 20 miles below Bytown. The flames first broke out in the neighborhood of the boilers. The Speed was a very fine, fast, new vessel, and cost, we are told, upwards of £8,000. No insurance was effected on her.—Montreal Herald of Tuesday.

NUMBER ONE.

CLEVELAND, June 14th.

Lamartine, a pure-hearted man and a true poet, says of the tourist belonging to his "order of mortals:"

"The poet traveller—his bread is thought—
His heart doth live upon the works of God."

This must be true, but it is not the whole truth. Other travellers besides the poet love nature, and are fain to claim her as their "dearest mother still." It is the glorious privilege of all tourists to see her in her Protean phazes of grandeur and loveliness; and he who can even measurably appreciate the sublime and beautiful in external things, must receive daily a portion of the "bread of thought," and have his faith more firmly established in that Good Being who has made so many bright and lovely things.

LAKE ERIE, June 15th.

Passing from Cleveland to Detroit in the beautiful Hendrik Hudson to night, how refreshing it is to sit on the upper deck at this late and quiet hour, and be fanned by the balmy breeze. Withdrawn from the dust of the city and the oppressive heat of the noontide sun, one can here lay open his bosom to the invigorating influences of heaven's mild breath, and bathe his whole mortal self in an ocean of ease. Meanwhile, he can give to thought its wildest, loftiest range without fear of it sheing called home on a sudden, to attend to the dry matters of practical being: and while

"heaven's ebon vault,
Studded with stars unutterably bright,
Through which the moon's unclouded grandeur rolls,
Seems like a canopy which love had spread
To curtain the sleeping world," embracing so opportune a moment, the imagination may shoot away, and take a few turns round yonder worlds of light, and drop, here and there, a query into the ear of immensity.

Tell me, Saturn, are the democrats in thy distant realms as noisy, at times, as the democrats of Cleveland have been this afternoon in their reception of Gen. Cass? or does one party embrace all the members of thy great confederacy and thus render man-worship unnecessary? Tell me, red-eyed Mars, are thine inhabitants, like thine old sponsor of mythological notoriety, always for war, and do all thy generals aspire to the presidency? And thou Venus, Hebe of the radiant sisterhood of night,—tell me if the crystal waters of thy fairy lakes are ever broken by the on-dashing monsters of the deep, with oaken ribs, and breath of steam, and nostrils spouting fire? or do the scaly tribes that inhabit thine inland seas, fold up their fins at night and quietly repose on their beds of golden sand, till Aurora sprinkles the mountains with rosy light, and some trumpet tongued "fish-horn," reverberating through all thy watery domains, gives a universal summon to breakfast?

But to all these queries, stammering conjecture frames an indefinite answer; and thanking the moon for furnishing us a temporary lamp, and bidding her and the world good night, we go to the embrace of "Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

DETROIT, June 17th.

How like enchantment are the operations of the Michigan Central Railroad! One short year ago the 17 acres of ground which they had purchased for their eastern terminus, lay almost naked, and partly under water; now there are standing there, completed or nearly so, a freight depot 100 feet wide and 800 feet long; a passenger depot 326 feet long and 75 feet wide; two large warehouses; a circular engine house 130 feet in diameter, covered with a dome which is surmounted with a cupola; and a spacious machine shop.—Other buildings for the repairing and making of cars, etc., are in a state of erection, and a wharf 1100 feet in length is being constructed. If this company is not the embodiment of the genius of enterprise, there is no such thing in Yankeedom.

THE HOME JOURNAL.—A new volume of this journal commenced the first of July. There could not exist a happier combination of talent for conducting a family paper than is found in Morris & Willis. They serve up for their patrons from week to week a most delightful dish embracing all the "varieties of the season" and by way of dessert give them the cream of foreign politics, chit-chat, &c. Published by Morris & Willis, at two dollars a year, 107 Fulton street, New York.

UNION MAGAZINE FOR JULY.—This number opens with an article entitled "Sight-seeing in Europe," by the editor, who is now in England; and there is no one who has read her piquant, humorous sketches of western life, that will not look eagerly for her limning of foreign scenes and personages. Park Benjamin, Henry B Hirst, J. Bayard Taylor, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Gould, and Miss Lynch, also enrich this issue with articles. The engravings are certainly unique. Published at three dollars a year by Jas. L. De Graw, 140 Nassau street, New York.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.—It is to be regretted that our citizens have for a few years past taken no measures to commemorate our great nation's birth-day according to its spirit. The different kinds of entertainment at the gardens and elsewhere, are well enough in their way, but not eminently calculated to fan the fire which burned in the bosoms of our revolutionary sires.

YOUNG PHILLIPS who committed suicide at the Brattleboro Water Cure a week or two since, bequeathed one hundred thousand dollars to the Harvard University to aid in erecting its observatory. He was worth about seven hundred thousand dollars.

European News.

The Cambria arrived at Boston from Liverpool on Friday last, with one week's later advices from Europe. The most interesting news she brings is of the manifestation of a feeling in France in favor of the establishment of an empire and the restoration of the Bonaparte dynasty in the person of Louis Napoleon, the son of Louis, ex-King of Holland, and Hortense Beauharnois.—Not enough has been received to warrant an expression of opinion as to the result of this manifestation, though the calling of Louis Napoleon to the throne, seems now a much more probable event than the establishment of a constitutional republic in France. Thus far the course of things has shown pretty conclusively, that, whatever else may be said, the French people, or the men to whom they have delegated the conduct of public affairs and the reorganization of government, are not adequate to the task proposed. There are great and pure men among them, but, unhappily, their influence is neutralized or overpowered by the efforts of ambitious demagogues, and the prevalence of wild anarchical doctrines, and the general ignorance of the people. If these difficulties did not exist, the fact that in France there is no possibility of organizing a republic on the basis of a federal union of States, as in this country, would lessen the chances of success. In this fact of a federal union, with its consequent division and balance of powers, will be found the secret of our stability and strength, and we very much doubt whether any republic, lacking that element, can be firmly established. A republic could be established in Germany, according to our notion, with far greater ease than in France, but we are very strongly inclined to believe that the first real republic in Europe will be organized in Great Britain.

The English news is comparatively unimportant. As full a summary of the intelligence as we could find room for, will be found below.

The position and prospects of the West India sugar planters had given rise to several public meetings in England on the subject.

The threatened demonstration of the Chartists in London on the 12th of June, proved even a more signal failure than the previous affair of the 10th of April, at Kennington Common.

Tom Steele, Head Pacificator for Ireland, under O'Connell's Repeal Association, died at London on the 15th.

A number of Chartists in London have been indicted for sedition.

The Spanish Minister to England has left for home in a "huff;" diplomatic intercourse between the two nations is therefore suspended.—There is no reason to anticipate anything worse, however.

Affairs are more quiet in Ireland. The subscription for Mrs. Mitchell, wife of the exile, has reached the sum of £1116. The repeal agitation is declared to have come to a stand still. The "fraternization" of the Young and Old Irelander, or the two Repeal Associations, is not yet perfected.

In France, great excitement prevailed and the friends of the Republic were much alarmed, in consequence of the popular enthusiasm manifested for Prince Louis Napoleon, who has been chosen to the National Assembly, by a large vote, obtained without an apparent effort. The French yet worship the name of Napoleon, and the popular revolution that has just now occurred in favor of this young member of the family, points, according to the English papers, to a return to a one-man power with him to wield it.

Louis Napoleon, says the European Times, was, at latest accounts, expected hourly in Paris to take his seat. He will affect humility, and buy golden opinions from all men. With the most ordinary prudence and caution the high road to imperial power is straight open before him, and in that case the splendid pageant of a French Republic will dissolve,

> And like the baseless fabric of a vision,
> Leave not a wreck behind.

The Vraie Republique says that the revolution is only beginning. This is the paper of Barbes, Pierre Leroux, George Sand, Louis Blanc, &c.

At last accounts, Louis Napoleon remained in London.

There is nothing strikingly important from other parts of the Continent.

It is asserted that the Russians have crossed the Pruth on the frontier of Bessarabia, the Austrian Minister at Constantinople protesting in vain against it.

It is also reported that a large Russian force had marched into Prussia and entered Memel.

The people of Berlin are again in a state of tumult, the democratic party being arrayed against the Court party. The present excitement grew out of a vote in the Berlin Parliament. Civil war is threatened.

Nothing decisive had occurred in Austrian Italy, since the battle of Goito and the fall of Peschiera. The future movements of the two armies it is impossible to predict. The Austrians are confined to the neighborhood of Mantua, and the Piedmontese are engaged in cutting off their communications with Verona.

It is said that the Pope has expressed a most anxious desire to visit Ireland.

The Lords of the Treasury have prohibited the exportation of arms from England, to be employed in hostilities against Denmark.

Obituary.—On the 17th ult., at Constantinople. Prince Mahomet D'Abil, son of the Sultan.

A Postcript to Willmer & Smith's European Times says that the latest advices from Paris state that the Bonapartist excitement continues, and means are taken to keep it vigorous. Pamphlets in praise of Prince Louis Napoleon are strewed about the crowded assemblies, and newspapers in his interest are distributed gratis. The Prince has issued the following address to his constituents:

London, June 11.

Fellow-Citizens:—Your suffrages fill me with gratitude. This mark of sympathy is the more flattering to me, as it was unsolicited on my part, and reached me at a moment when I regretted being inactive, when the country had need of all her children to extricate her from the difficulties in which she was placed.

Your confidence imposes upon me duties which I shall know how to fulfil: our interests and our sentiments are the same. A child of Paris, now a representative of the people. I shall unite my efforts to those of my colleagues to re-establish order, credit and labor; to secure peace abroad, to consolidate democratic institutions,and to reconcile interests which appear hostile, because parties are struggling against each other, instead of working for one common end —the grandeur and prosperity of the country.

The people have been free since February 25.—They can obtain all they want without having recourse to brute force. Let us, then, rally round the altar of our country, under the flag of the Republic, and give to the world the grand spectacle of a people who have regenerated themselves without violence, civil war, or anarchy.

Receive, fellow-citizens, the assurance of my devotedness and sympathy.

LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

On the evening of Tuesday the National Assembly, by a large majority, stultified their vote of the previous day, when they confirmed the exile of Louis Napoleon, and now revoked it, and declared that he should be admitted as a member of the National Assembly.

Ledru Rollin opposed this proceeding; but the majority prevailed.

In consequence of this vote, Louis Napoleon is admitted to take his seat, subject, however, to prove that he is a French citizen.

The Assembly separated at a quarter past six, in extraordinary agitation.

It is said that Ledru Rollin immediately resigned, and that Lamartine would follow his example. It is said that a triumvirate of Marrast, Billault and Cavaignac is being formed, but this is mere conjecture. At Ardennes a proclamation has been issued calling upon the people to rush to arms, and to place Louis Napoleon on the throne. However, before it comes to that, there will be a struggle for supremacy between the Legitimists and the Bonapartists.

Thiers, Odillon Barrot, Berryer, and Duvergier de Hauranne voted in favor of Louis Napoleon.

On Wednesday Paris was quiet, the people had triumphed. Louis Napoleon was expected hourly in Paris to take his seat.

A meeting of the Representatives was held, to request Lamartine, Arago and Garnier Pages to remain in the Government, even should Ledru Rollin retire.

At the last accounts, notwithstanding their defeat, the Executive Commission still kept their ground. On the 15th inst. the Assembly was discussing a proposition for declaring Algeria an integral part of France. Paris was tranquil.

The walls were, on the 15th, stuck over with a placard bearing no signature, but recommending in strong terms the Assembly to dismiss the Government and the Ministry, and to confer a dictatorship on M. Caussidiere.

The Prince de Joinville and Duc d'Aumale, report says, have passed some days in Paris, also that the Duke of Bordeaux has been there, and been received by the Duke Montemart, and passed a day with his nurse.

The Prince de Joinville, however, is said to have refused to encourage an attempt to overthrow the existing government. The attempts of the police to arrest these dangerous visiters, though aware of their presence, had been unsuccessful.

Paris was said to be quiet at the latest dates; but that there are causes enough at work to produce excitement is very manifest.

Mr. Lesseps, the French Ambassador at Madrid, and Mr. Henderson, deputed as an envoy by the English bondholders, are reported, by the last advices, to have waited together upon the Spanish finance minister, and demanded "the large sums due to France and England on divers accounts." This seems to be a simultaneous step with Lord Palmerston's dismissal of M. Isturitz.

The following extracts are from the second edition of the London Times of the 16th:

The draught of the constitution for France was said to be ready for presentation, and was referred to generally yesterday. Rumor stated that it would recommend a President who should hold office for four years, and that M. Arago would probably be selected for that post. Prince Louis Napoleon was also spoken of, but only it is believed, to bring him into discredit. A very strong petition to the Assembly was in course of signature, recommending M. Caussidiere for the office.—"Strange to say," observes our correspondent, "neither M. Lamartine nor M. Ledru Rollin are mentioned as candidates."

The Committee appointed by the National Assembly to report on subjects of legislation was occupied on Tuesday in examining petitions. A most singular petition was presented from Citizen Barete, residing at 35, Faubourgh Montmatre, demanding that a plurality of wives should be permitted in marriage.

It was understood in Paris yesterday that a "family council" was held in Paris on Tuesday of the moderate friends of Prince Louis Bonaparte, at which it was resolved to exhort him to persevere in the intention he had announced not to return to France until the Constitution had been voted by the National Assembly.

The London Standard of June 16th, says that up to the present time Prince Louis Napoleon remains at his residence in London, without any orders having been given for a removal.

Letters from Naples to the 4th of June state that all continued quiet, but there were indications that this was but a temporary state. The Republican party were evidently only waiting a favorable opportunity for another struggle, while the troops and lazzaroni, flushed by success, and with an eager appetite for further plunder, were doing their best to provoke such an event by insolence.

Kingdom of Northern Italy.—The votes given in the province of Milan, for the immediate union of Lombardy with Piedmont, amounted to 129,440, and those opposed to it did not exceed 272. In the province of Cremona. there were for the union, 47,064; against it, 24. In the province of Lodi, for the union, 46,860; against it, 69.

A considerable number of the chief places of the Venetian provinces had also declared themselves in the same sense, and it is now nearly certain that the Provisional Government at Venice will adopt a like course. The Kingdom of Northern Italy will thus probably be soon consolidated, so as to form a rampart or boulevard protecting the Southern States of the Peninsula from the encroachment of Northern Powers.

Letters from Bologna, published in the supplement to the Contemporaneo, of Rome, of the 2d June, announce that negotiations are already on foot between the Austrian Government and Charles Albert. Austria is to retire her troops from Italy on condition that Italy shall take upon it a part of the Austrian debt. It is said that the Pope will be the referee to settle the conditions.

The Hungarians have resolved not to fight against the Italian cause.

The Pope has declared his willingness to place the iron crown of Charlemagne on the head of Charles Albert, if it would tend to the peace of Italy.

From Ireland there is no news of importance. The "Irish League," or union of the repeal association and the Irish confederation, is not yet consummated. It was postponed for a fortnight, to allow of an expression of opinion from the various branch associations. The opinion seems to prevail that the coalition will not be sustained.

A report was in circulation that a warrant had been issued for the arrest of Meagher. It seems to want confirmation. Mr. Smith O'Brien seems to keep in the shade. Clubs were in process of formation in many parts of the country. Emigration is still in progress on a very extended scale, notwithstanding the stringency of the recent regulations. Some of the boards of guardians are taking advantage of the facilities afforded by the Colonial Land and Emigration Commmissioners, to send out paupers and children.

Accounts from Vienna confirm the statement of the Emperor of Austria's wish to resign his imperial authority in favor of his brother, Archduke Francis Charles. But it is asserted that in that case, the Archduke Charles is prepared to resign his rights in favor of his son Francis Josef, during whose minority the Archduchess Sophia (a sister of the Queen of Prussia) would be Regent. Vienna is perfectly quiet, and even the secession of Bohemia has failed in producing a lasting impression.

It is understood that, the centralization system of Prince Metternich being now completely broken up, the future government of the Austrian Empire will be attempted on the federal plan; Hungary constituting one independent state; Transylvania another, Croatia and Illyria a third, Istria and Dalmatia a fourth, and Bohemia and Moravia a fifth, united only by their common allegiance to the Emperor and for all purposes of commerce, war or defence.

Letters from Potsdam state that the King of Prussia intends to abdicate his sovereignty in favor of his brother, the Prince of Prussia; and that it was this determination of his Majesty which caused his ministers to hasten the return of the Prince to Berlin.

The war has been renewed between the Danes and Germans with great vigor, and all hopes of mediation appear at an end. It is said the former will agree to no other settlement. An action was, however, fought between the belligerent troops, on the 5th instant, and appears to have resulted to the advantage of the Danes.

M. William Tell Poussin has been appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France to the republic of the United States.

Novel Correspondence.—We find in the Boston Daily Advertiser, a correspondence between Tsi Yeng, the Chinese Governor at Canton, on the occasion of his leaving that city for Pekin, to enter upon the duties of Prime Minister, and Dr. Parker, the American Secretary of Legation at Canton. The correspondence is in a most amicable style and shows the friendly relations which exist between the two nations, as well as the estimation in which Dr. Parker is held by the Chinese functionaries. These semi-official state papers, are something new with the Celestials, but they exhibit much more of liberal views and enlargement of mind, than we are accustomed to give them credit for, in political matters and international courtesy.

Mrs. Parker, sent a sheet of note paper with the Dr.'s reply, requesting the autograph of Tsi Yeng, to which he returned the following,

Your Lady, Sir, has commanded me to write my autograph upon a sheet of note paper (which you enclosed) but in the hurry and confusion of making ready for my journey, I am mortified that I cannot do it well. (Such as it is) I enclose a present to defile (her fingers) and excite a smile.

Tsi Yeng, is succeeded by Governor Jee, who is renowned as cherishing a very upright mind, and transacting business equitably and justly—and that his talents are great and his knowledge vast in both civil and military affairs.

Phenomenon.—A very brilliant phenomenon was visible from Williamsburgh and Brooklyn, and partially so from our city, last Friday evening. Just before sunset, the horizon was covered with dense thunder clouds, which extended to the zenith, and were also very black in the North and South. As the storm advanced, they appeared to be concentrating over New York, and from our position on Long Island presented a very grand appearance. At about fifteen minutes before sunset, a sudden flush of gold pervaded the lower portion of the cloud directly West of us, and then as suddenly spread until the whole semi-circle from the North to the South point was flooded with an inconceivably brilliant golden lustre. It was dazzling to the eyes in any portion of the Western sky. This strange wall of gold advanced swiftly until it hid New York from the view. The city seemed involved in a flood of terrific beauty. We observed the commotion of a coming tempest in the dense black clouds above the gold, but the latter appeared like a perfect, unwaving, unbroken wall, extending from the North point, or a little East of North, to the extreme South, a little higher at the West than at the extremities. A Millerite might have been pardoned a fright at the scene. Children were in great terror, and some older persons. In the midst of the whole, a sudden edge of deep crimson seemed to ray out from the clouds, and at that moment a flash of lightning passed five times up and down across the gold in the West. We never have seen so brilliant an appearance. It was more like a sudden rift in the clouds, letting through the indescribable glory, in its full radiance, which had before been struggling through clouds.

This scene was followed by a hurricane and storm of rain, but at 8½ o'clock in the evening, the west ends of houses were lit as if by a large fire. The same appearance was noticed as far east as Hartford and New Haven.—Jour. of Com.

Stores in Federal Street "caved in"—Great Destruction of Property, and Wonderful Preservation of Life.—Great excitement was produced in this city soon after 9 o'clock on Sunday morning, by a tremendous crash which occurred in the new granite front "Dearborn block," Nos. 27, 29 and 31 Federal-street, erected by Mr. George Gerrish of Chelsea, and occupied by Messrs. Dutton, Richardson & Co., and Waterson, Pray & Co., wholesale dealers in dry goods. Two brick pillars in the cellar having given way, the iron posts in the upper stories were forced through the floors, causing the floors so to settle in the centre, as to form a set of tunnels from the attic to the cellar, and precipitating cases and bales of goods towards their centres. Some 30 persons were in the building at the time of the accident, but the cracking of the timbers gave a sufficient warning, and enabled them all to escape. Some jumped out of the windows—3 men in the third story came down by the fall; a boy in the fourth story was so frightened by the crash, that he got out of a window, upon a narrow stone sill, and walked the whole length of the block.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, however, a still more terrific crash occurred. A large portion of the rear wall (brick) fell in, breaking down the entire floorings of the building, and tumbling about 800 cases of goods into the basement.—Three of the workmen who were relieving the strained floors of their weight, were precipitated with the falling mass. They were badly but not seriously injured. A youth named Charles Pierce, was buried a great depth beneath the pile of ruins, which, however, was kept from crushing him by the formation of a net work of timbers immediately above him. After about four hours labor by a gang of workmen, he was relieved from his perilous position, and though severely bruised had no bones broken.—Boston Chronotype.

Later From Mexico.

From the N. O. Delta of June 21.

The Royal Mail Steamer Trent, Capt. Norton, arrived at Ship Island on Monday evening the 19th inst., at 6 P. M. She left Vera Cruz on the 15th at 9 P. M. We have received verbal intelligence by the Trent to the 13th of June from the City of Mexico, and our correspondence from Vera Cruz to the 15th. The last division of the army, under Gen. Worth, which had been stationed at Tacubaya, three leagues from the city, broke up its quarters and marched through the city, bringing up the rear of the army. Immediately after the departure of Gen. Worth, the officers of Herrera's Government arrived near the city, and were escorted into it by the National Guards. Some firing was heard at this time, which, it was reported, arose from a conflict between the National Guards and the Leperos, the latter having declared their determination to overthrow the former.

Gen. Paredes was said to be in the City of Mexico.

There were encamped at Encero, awaiting transportation, nearly 10,000 troops, consisting of Gen. Lane's division, Gen. Paterson's 1st division of volunteers, and Gen. Marshall's 2d division, composed partly of regulars and volunteers. The troops were enjoying fine health.

Six out of the so-called "Ten Regiments" were encamped at Sardinia, three miles from Jalapa, on the National Road, under command of Col. Morgan.

Gen. W. O. Butler was in command at Jalapa. Troops were constantly arriving there, en route for Vera Cruz.

The following regiments were to leave Encero on the 16th for Vera Cruz, and would probably take transportation thence on the 21st and 22d:—New York, 1st and 2d Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, South Carolina, Georgia Battalion, two regiments of Ohioans, New Jersey and the District of Columbia and Maryland Battalion. The South Carolinians and Georgians were to sail for Mobile, the others for New Orleans.

Capt. Tilghman's Light Artillery was to leave on the 16th inst. for this city.

A train arrived at Vera Cruz from Encero, on the afternoon of the 15th, and reported having met an express at San Juan, going on to Encero to carry intelligence that additional transports awaited them at Vera Cruz.

The Trent got under way shortly after the arrival of the British courier at Vera Cruz, leaving behind, it is said, more that a million and a half of specie. Her hasty departure is attributed to important English intelligence from the City of Mexico.

The health of Vera Cruz had improved. A norther had been blowing from the 9th to the 14th, an occurrence which has not happened at this season of the year for more than a quarter of a century.

Many of the invalid officers and men are represented to have died on the march from the interior, being unable to undergo the fatigue of the journey at this season.

Col. Sevier, our Commissioner, had arrived at Vera Cruz, and taken passage in one of the Government steamers for this port.

Col. Dominguez and staff, of the Mexican Spy Company, formerly in the employ of Gen. Scott, has also arrived at Vera Cruz, and were to leave on the Maria Burt. His soldiers, 125 in number, were anxious to come to the United States, as they had been maltreated, and feared the vengeance of their countrymen.

City of Mexico, May 29, 1848.

The revels in the Halls of the Montezumas are rapidly drawing to a close. The lights will soon be extinguished, the banquet ball deserted; and in a few brief but joyous days the Anglo-Saxon will retrace his measured steps to the home of his fathers his bosom swelling with manly pride for deeds of noble valor, while imagination bodies forth the pure and calm delight of once more embracing "wife, children and friends."

Delightful, however, as it may be to return to their native land, there are few among them that will not feel some pang of regret as they bid farewell to this sunny clime, rich in natural beauty and historical associations—rich in its noble views, its fertile luxuriance, its massive structures, its fountains and Alamedas and Paseos, its splendid churches, and their gorgeous decorations and paintings, and dreamy music and mystic ceremonies.

I deem it, however, no visionary speculation to say that the Anglo-Saxon has not yet run his full career in this country—that the far-seeing Jonathan, ever true to the principles of his parent stock, will again visit this Eldorado of the Western World. He goes home but to refit and repair damages, and will then be ready for a new crusade, be it to spread the principles of democracy, of religious toleration—to infuse the blood of his race into the veins of the descendants of the Aztecs, or to fill his pockets with Mexican mint drops.

One of these objects he has already effected, it is said to a very considerable extent; the seed has been sown, and it seems but fair and natural that those who have sown, should feel inclined to return and receive the fruits of their labors at the hands of the fair Senoritas—some thousands of whom, poor creatures, are bewailing the departure of their lovers with tears and lamentations, doomed, it is said, to have their flowing locks and rich suits of hair cropped from their lovely heads, as a penance for their devotion to their heretical admirers.—N. O. Delta, June 17th.

State Printing.—The Secretary of State and Comptroller have given notice that they have awarded the printing and publishing of all notices required by the 4th section of the act to provide for the public printing, to Edwin Croswell & Sherman Croswell, proprietors of the Albany Argus, they having agreed to publish such notices without charge, and being the lowest bidders for the same.

Soul Discipline.

BY MRS. OAKES SMITH.

No inward pang, no yearning love
Is lost to human hearts;
No anguish that the spirit feels
When bright-winged hope departs;
Though in the mystery of life
Discordant powers prevail—
That life itself be weariness,
And sympathy may fail—

Yet all becomes a discipline
To lure us to the sky;
And angels bear the good it brings,
With fostering care on high.
Though others, weary at the watch,
May sink to toil-spent sleep,
And we are left in solitude,
And agony to weep—

Yet they with ministering zeal
The cup of healing bring,
And bear our love and gratitude
Away on heavenly wing,
And thus the inner life is wrought,
The blending earth and heaven—
The love more earnest in its glow,
Where much has been forgiven.

☞ DOUBLE CRIME.—A double tragedy of an attempt at murder and suicide was enacted yesterday afternoon, by a man named George Hammond residing on Chicago street, in this city. He inflicted several large and severe gashes upon the breast, neck and back of his wife, and then, thinking, doubtless, that he had accomplished his object of murdering her, cut a horrid gash in his own throat with a razor. Both were severely wounded, and it is thought that the woman will recover, but that the man will not, though he was alive when heard from last. Jealousy is assigned as the cause of the act of attempted murder and self-destruction.

P. S. Hammond was not so severely wounded as thought at first, and has been arrested, and examined before Justice CHILD, and committed to jail.

☞ A NEW SPECIES OF FRAUD.—Last Wednesday a man called at the house of Bishop TIMON during his absence, with a large package, elaborately done up and sealed with four large impressions, representing that it contained money, &c., and demanded and received five dollars for it—after which the same person called upon the Pastor of St. Louis Church, presented a similar package and obtained a similar amount from the servant girl, in the absence of the priest. The packages contained some old newspapers, and after the fraud was discovered were left with the Mayor. They were done up in a style calculated to deceive. Persons should be careful to caution domestics and others in their employ against paying charges upon any thing of the kind. Had the principals been at home in either of these cases, it is probable the rogues would not have attempted the fraud.

VOL. X. BUFFALO, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1848. NO. 24.

For the Western Literary Messenger

Impromptu—On hearing of Unkind Remarks.

They say that I am friendless,
That my heart is proud and cold;
'Tis well—I may not woo the smile
Which others can withhold:
But not the less shall kindness
In my heart of hearts still be,
A fountain living, full and deep,
For some who love not me.

They say that I am friendless,
But they know not of a band,
With looks of kindly greeting,
Who come from memory's land:
They dream not of those radiant ones,
The painless, pure, and high,
Who are not of earth, yet lowly list
To my thirsting spirit's sigh.

Yet would I deem it blessing,
While life's troubled ways I tread,
To pause by each lonely pillow
And raise the drooping head.
Yea, I would deem it blessing,
A gift indeed divine,
If a spell o'er pain's sad throbbings
Of soothing power were mine.

It is not thus—no utterance
From my prison-breast may steal,
Of all the sympathy it knows
Even painfully to feel.
Still some will call me friendless,
Still the boon of love refuse,
But the calmness which my soul has won
It may not lightly lose.

THE RECLUSE.

Leap-Year Calls.

I.

Lady reader, plotting against the state of "single blessedness" in which a certain individual—you know whom—is luxuriating—wondering, in the innocence of your heart why he "do'nt propose"—a word in your ear, I pray. "Hats off, gentlemen," and let "the angels listen in silence," while I quote a short paragraph which recently met my eye, and which must have had its origin in the days of Chaucer or Spenser:—

"Albeit it is now a parte of the Common Lawe that as often as every besextile year doth return, the ladyes have sole privilege, during the time it continueth, of making love unto the men, which they may doe, either by words or lookes, as unto them it seemeth proper; and moreover, no man shall be entitled to the benefits of clergy, who dothe refuse to accept the offers of a ladye, or who dothe in any wise treat her proposal with slight or contumely."

An editor out West, suddenly inspired by this piece of information, breaks forth on this wise. Hear him. He is evidently in a beatific state of mind: "Think of sitting all alone in your office, indulging in a fit of the blues, of the deepest shade. Dick Ruggles has just left you. He has been on a visit to your old chum, Fred. Wild, who some five years since "committed matrimony." Fine wife! lovely children! excellent dinners! everything so cozy and comfortable. Anathematizing your own bashfulness, which has always been a stumbling-block in the way of your advancement into the good graces of the fair sex, you hear a slight knock at the door. Anticipating the visit of some clamorous dun, or, at least, some little urchin who has been dispatched to borrow the newspaper for his father, you exclaim, in no very pleasant tone of voice, "Come in!" Another and louder knock follows. Starting to your feet, muttering something which would sound strangely to ears polite, you open the door, with an expression of countenance not calculated to reassure your visitor— and behold, Fanny Ray! the very individual of whom you were thinking scarce five minutes since. Your countenance undergoes a sudden change; trembling with ill-disguised agitation, you invite her to walk in, to take a seat. Imagine all the embarrassment attending such an occasion to have vanished, all the general topics of conversation to have been discussed, and the hour waning towards a close. A silence of a few moments succeeds. Suddenly, softly, silently, Fanny takes your unresisting hand in her own. How your heart thrills at the touch of that little soft, white hand, and the warm life-tide suffuses your countenance. You are silent —"Jeremiah," she whispers. Still no reply. "No words your trembling lips allow." She speaks again—"Will you be mine?" Softly, tenderly, pleadingly her blue eyes look into your own—we cannot go on. Imagine all this, ye disconsolate bachelors, and let your voices swell the glad chorus, "The year of Jubilee has come!"

I think the ladies of the village of P——must have had an inkling of the quaint old paragraph we have quoted above, when one evening, soon after the advent of Leap Year, some half dozen of them met, in solemn conclave, in the large old fashioned parlor of that vine-wreathed cottage which Nell Morris, the beauty and belle of the village called her home. She was beautiful certainly, or she would not have been acknowledged as the belle, in a village where every young lady could boast of a pretty face, in connection with other and more substantial charms. But Nell was a mad capt, mischievous little elf, probably because she was an only child, and had been petted and indulged from infancy, and I only wonder, after passing through the ordeal of a fashionable boarding school, in a distant city from which she had just returned, that she was not entirely spoiled. But then she was frank, generous, and impulsive, and those qualities in the estimation of some, sufficiently atone for a deficiency in other respects. It seems strange that such an universal favorite as our heroine should still remain unmarried, but there were not many eligibles among the swains of the village. Nell was rather fastidious, and perhaps a little ambitious, and some of the most interesting cavaliers, strange to say, were afflicted with bashfulness, or something which prevented them from sharing so largely in the smiles of the ladies as they might have done. Justly indignant at their backwardness, the ladies of P——concluded, after a solemn consultation in Nell Morris' parlor, to avail themselves of the privileges of the

Leap Year, and immediately to invade the premises of such of those fated individuals as were luxuriating in single blessedness. Among the victims selected, was a gentleman in whose behalf all Nell's interest, and much of the romance which was part and parcel of her nature, had been awakened. Alfred Barton, Attorney and Counsellor at Law, as the sign over his office proclaimed in large golden letters, was sufficiently "tall, pale, and interesting," to awaken the interest of any lady, and there was a slight mystery hanging about him, which, coupled with his personal appearance, rendered him almost irresistible. He might perhaps, have reached his twenty-eighth year—the ladies did not know positively, as none of them had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with him, and their papas, who sometimes had professional business with him, forebore to enquire respecting his age. He had only resided in the village for about six months, and report said that the lady to whom he had been affianced, having prove faithless, he had since avoided female society. This was sufficient, of itself, to awaken Nell's interest, and she accepted a challenge from the merry group around the fire, that on the day following, she would call on Lawyer Burton, at his office, and then and there make his acquaintance. It must be confessed that her heart beat somewhat faster than usual, when, in company with a little sister of one of her friends, she turned towards Lawyer Burton's office on the following afternoon, and when, in reply to her gentle knock, footsteps were heard within, approaching the door, she actually grew nervous. The glance of profound astonishment with which he regarded his visitant, did not reassure her, and both for a moment stood in equal embarrassment. The lawyer first recovered his self-possession, and courteously invited her to walk in. Nell hesitated a moment, entering, and turning to bid her companion to follow her, saw, in dismay, that she was rapidly making her way out of the door. To retreat was now impossible, and feeling with vexation that her face was assuming each moment, a deeper and still deeper hue of pink, she seated herself in silence. Had it not been for the immense volumes scattered around, and the table, loaded with all the appurtinences of a lawyer's office, Nell might have fancied herself in a lady's boudoir, for there were luxurious ottomans and lounges disposed around, and birds and flowers, and almost everything that could charm the taste. But she scarcely heeded these, as blushing, trembling and confused, she sat in a corner of the sofa, not venturing to lift her eyes to meet the glance which she felt was fixed upon her face. At last the lawyer broke the silence: "Can I be of any service to you, Miss—Miss Morris, I believe it is." Nell made a desperate effort to reply, and looking up she met Mr. Burton's eyes fixed upon her face. There was something beside inquiry in that glance—something which the heart of every beautiful woman might understand, and it brought confidence to her tone as she replied, with a half smile, she did not come to consult him professionally, and then she stopped again for a moment. All the appropriate remarks which she had been arranging during her walk, were minus, at present, and her usual self-possession was rapidly taking its flight, particularly when she encountered the eyes of Burton—such eyes fixed upon her face. It was so provoking, she thought to be able to recall nothing apropos, and she murmured something somewhat incoherently about "Leap Year," and "privileges." The lawyer seemed instantly to comprehend what she intended to have expressed in a more graceful manner, and there was a slight shade of sarcasm mingled with the gallant speeches to which the announcement would of course give occasion. At any rate, although she managed to sustain her part in the conversation, she felt extremely embarrassed, and making a much shorter call than she intended when she first accepted the challenge of her companions, she hastily turned her steps homeward, followed to the street door by lawyer Burton, who politely invited her to call again. The moment she gained the privacy of her apartment, she resorted to that last feminine solace, a hearty fit of weeping, the result of mingled mortification and vexation. What would Lawyer Burton think of her, a lady and a stranger, thus intruding herself upon his solitude. The plea of its being a privileged season, Leap Year, now appeared a very unsatisfactory excuse to her, and probably he thought so likewise. How she must have lowered herself in his estimation! Every remark he had made, had indicated a fine taste, and excellent good sense. How like a silly girl—even worse, an artful and designing coquette, must she appear in his eyes.

In the midst of her agreeable reflections, evening came on, and she was startled by the entrance of her mother, informing her that Mr. Burton was below, and had requested to see her. The good lady expressed her wonder at the appearance of such an unusual visitant, being entirely unconscious of the afternoons' occurrence, but Nell was too much agitated to heed her expressions of surprise. For what could he desire to see her again? Should she descend to the parlor and frankly acknowledge her indiscretion, in thus obtruding herself upon his notice? In that case he might, perhaps, fancy that she wished to improve upon the acquaintance she had already commenced.—No, she would retrace the step she had taken, if possible, and discourage every attempt on his part, to continue the acquaintance, and leave him to draw the inference from her conduct, which she supposed would be most apparent. So giving her mother a somewhat unsatisfactory excuse for so doing, she declined seeing Lawyer Burton, who had called for very private and particular reasons of his own, and was somewhat perplexed at being thus cavalierly treated. The cold bow which Nell bestowed upon him, when next they met, discouraged any attempt at farther acquaintance, and so Spring and Summer passed away, and no immediate result followed her experiment at making Leap Year Calls, though nine matches had followed the exertions of several of her acquaintances, who availed themselves of their privileges.

II.

It was a bright moonlight evening in the latter part of Autumn, when Nell, enveloped in a cloak and hood, which served as a complete disguise, took her way through the principal street of the village, and directing her steps toward Lawyer Burton's office, she knocked with a trembling hand at the door. He opened it, and started with surprise as a female form, closely muffled, met his view. He invited her to enter, however, but as Nell hastily flung back her hood, he uttered an exclamation of astonishment. "Miss Morris! is it possible? To what am I indebted for a second call?" Nell did not heed the tone in which this question was made, but laying her hand upon his arm, she struggled ineffectually to speak, and burst into tears. By the bright glow from the fire by which he had been sitting, Lawyer Burton saw that she was very pale, and extremely agitated.—The slight expression of hauteur which had crossed his fine countenance when he first recognized his visitant, instantly vanished; he beat soothingly, but respectfully over her, and seated her unresistingly upon the sofa from which he had arisen. A moment or two elapsed before Nell had sufficiently recovered her composure to trust her voice, but when she at last spoke, she did so pleadingly and earnestly.

"I know not what you may think of me," she said. "Judge of me as you will, but do not refuse what I am about to ask of you. A poor boy, as you well know, has to-day been arrested on suspicion of being an accomplice in occasioning the fire of last evening. I have been his only friend for two or three years past, and to night I have visited him in his confinement, and am as fully persuaded of his innocence, as I am of my own existence at this moment. To-morrow, as you are aware, he will be taken to the next town for trial, and I know not what will be his sentence —a heavy one, doubtless, for prejudice is strong against him, and many among us would gladly believe that the sins of his vicious and abandoned father rest upon his despised and outcast son.—He has something to tell you, which I am confident will not only prove his innocence, but also reveal the true offenders. Oh, you will not refuse to come with me this evening, and at least hear his defence for yourself."

Lawyer Burton shook his head somewhat doubtfully as Nell asserted the innocence of the young prisoner.

"Do not depend too much upon his word," he replied. "Evidence, almost amounting to certainty, is against him, and I will confess that my suspicions are strongly awakened, and with my present belief I can do but little to prove his innocence."

"But you will not refuse to hear his defence yourself," exclaimed Nell, starting from her seat, and clasping her small white hands pleadingly, as she looked anxiously into his face. "I know that his word is not always to be depended upon, but I am confident he would not deceive me. I ask only a few moments of you. No one knows of my visit to him but yourself, and I, too, must hasten, lest I shall be too late to prove of any service, for, as you know, no one can visit him after eight."

Five minutes' walk brought them to the low wooden building, where offenders against "the majesty of the law" were committed before their trial in the town adjoining the little village.—Drawing her hood still more closely over her face, so as to avoid being recognized by the turnkey, she followed her companion into the miserable little cell where Bill Robbins, the young offender, was confined. He was a bright intelligent looking lad, though it was evident from his appearance, that his associates had been none of the best.—The acts of kindness, which Nell had bestowed upon the motherless and outcast boy, had awakened much of his better nature, though it was not in her power to withdraw him from the vicious associations with which he had been surrounded; and the prejudices which had been strongly excited against him from the conduct of his abandoned father, had tended to keep him still farther aloof from those whose intercourse with him might have been productive of good. The grateful smile with which he greeted her entrance, amply compensated Nell for the momentary struggle she had undergone, when at last, in compliance with the urgent request of poor Bill, she consented to attempt to influence Lawyer Burton to hear the story he had to relate—conscious, at the same time, that the young prisoner could send no other messenger. A few minutes' conversation with the boy, convinced Lawyer Burton that he was really innocent, and at the same time demonstrated clearly who were the true offenders. Giving him an assurance that he should soon be liberated, he once more accompanied Nell into the open air, and attended her homeward footsteps, making himself exceedingly agreeable to his fair companion, who, however, on her part, was unusually silent and thoughtful. What sudden spell has come over the usually gay and talkative little lady? Perhaps a mysterious influence, whose presence she was not yet willing to acknowledge.

"Good night, Miss Morris," said Lawyer Burton as they reached the gate of Nell's domicile. "I shall return your call to morrow. May I hope to find you disengaged?"

III.

"Pray tell me, Mrs. Burton," said a gentleman who was gaily chatting with a small bridal party which stood on the deck of one of our North River steamboats, some months after—"pray tell me how my old friend and your husband came within the magic circle of your presence? When I last parted with him in a distant city, more than a year since, he was apparently sinking fast in the depths of hopeless misanthropy—that is, with respect to the ladies. He had been jilted by a faithless lady love, and he solemnly declared, in my presence, that in future he intended to shun all female society; and as I know of old that when he has once declared his intentions respecting anything, you might as well attempt to move the Catskill mountains, as to change his purpose, I am curious to know how he could have been thrown into your society."

Nell, or Mrs. Burton, as we must now call her, hesitated a moment, then with a smile and a blush, she looked archly at her husband, as if expecting him to reply."

"My dear Sedley," said Lawyer Burton. "I must confess that I owe part of my present happiness to Leap Year.,'

"How so." enquired his friend, as he encountered the bride's mirthful glance. "I conclude Mrs. Burton must have become enamoured of the melancholy which sat gloomily upon your brow when we last parted, and seeking you out, threw herself on her knees in lover-like attitude before you, and offered you her heart and hand, which, in the recklessness of despair, you accepted, thinking that as "marriage and hanging go by fate," you might as well make your exit from the world by one way as the other."

"Not exactly," said Nell's husband. "I will tell you precisely how it came about. An individual, whose confidence in woman's love had once been coldly betrayed, sat one afternoon in the solitude of a lawyer's office, feeling particularly miserable, and dreaming that the sun of his hopes had forever set. There came a vision of youth, grace, and beauty to his loneliness—not an Ideal, but a Reality—(here Mrs. Burton slightly blushed) yet it vanished all too soon. But a gleam of sunlight broke once more upon his heart, and though when he would have sought the presence of his new enchantress, she coldly repulsed him, much of its beauty remained to cheer his loneliness.—But as month after month rolled away, the beam grew fainter and fainter, till it faded at last in the night of Disappointed Hope. Just then, the angel of his dream appeared once more on a mission of love and mercy—smiled propitiously upon him, and, to crown the whole, overturned all the philosophy with which he had been endeavoring to console himself, and made a Benedict of him."

"Quite a little 'Romance and Reality,'" laughed his listener. "You almost persuade me to sit down quietly and 'bide my time,' for the next four years, could I be so singularly fortunate at last as you have been"—and he bowed gallantly to Nell—"Henceforth I shall be a strong advocate for Leap Year Calls."—Nonpareil.

Mr. Winthrop's Address,

ON THE OCCASION OF LAYING THE CORNER STONE OF THE NATIONAL MONUMENT TO WASHINGTON.

Fellow-Citizens of the United States:

We are assembled to take the first step towards the fulfilment of a long deferred obligation. In this eight-and-fortieth year since his death, we have come together to lay the corner-stone of a National Monument to WASHINGTON.

Other monuments to this illustrious person have long ago been erected. By not a few of the great States of our Union, by not a few of the great cities of our States, the chiselled statue or the lofty column has been set up in his honor. The highest art of the old world—of France, of Italy, and of England, successively—has been put in requisition for the purpose. Houdon for Virginia, Canova for North Carolina, Sir Francis Chantrey for Massachusetts, have severally signalized their genius by portraying and perpetuating the form and features of the Father of his Country.

Nor has the Congress of the Nation altogether failed of its duty in this respect. The massive and majestic figure which presides over the precincts of the Capitol, and which seems almost in the act of challenging a new vow of allegiance to the Constitution and the Union from every one who approaches it, is a visible testimony—and one not the less grateful to an American eye as being the masterly production of a native artist—that the Government of the country has not been unmindful of what it owes to WASHINGTON.

One tribute to his memory is left to be rendered. One Monument remains to be reared. A monument which shall bespeak the gratitude, not of States, or of Cities, or of Governments; not of separate communities or of official bodies; but of the People, the whole People of the Nation—a National Monument, erected by the Citizens of the United States of America.

Of such a monument we have come to lay the corner-stone here and now. On this day, on this spot, in this presence, and at this precise epoch in the history of our country and of the world, we are about to commence this crowning work of commemoration.

The day, the place, the witnesses, the period in the world's history, in our own history—all, all are most appropriate to the occasion.

The day is appropriate. On this 4th day of July—emphatically the people's day—we come most fitly to acknowledge the people's debt to their first and greatest benefactor.

WASHINGTON, indeed, had no immediate connection with the immortal act of the 4th of July, 1776. His signature did not attest the Declaration of Independence. But the sword by which that independence was to be achieved was already at his side, and already had he struck the blow which rendered that declaration inevitable.

"Hostibus primo fugatis, Bostonium recuperatum," is the inscription on the medal which commemorates Washington's earliest triumph. And when the British forces were compelled to evacuate Boston, on the 17th day of March, 1776, bloodless though the victory was, the question was irrevocably settled that independence, and not the mere redress of grevances, was to be the momentous stake of our colonial struggle.

Without the event of the 4th of July, it is true, Washington would have found no adequate opening for that full career of military and civil glory which has rendered him illustrious forever. But it is equally true that without Washington, this day could never have acquired that renown in the history of human liberty, which now, above all other days, it enjoys. We may not say that the man made the day, or the day the man; but we may say that, by the blessing of God, they were made for each other, and both for the highest and most enduring good of America and of the world.

The place is appropriate. We are on the banks of his own beloved and beautiful Potomac. On one side of us, within a few hours' sail, are the hallowed scenes amid which Washington spent all of his mature life, which was not devoted to the public service of the country, and where still repose, in their original resting-place, all that remained of him when life was over. On the other side, and within our more immediate view, is the Capitol of the Republic, standing on the site selected by himself, and within whose walls the rights which he vindicated, the principles which he established, the institutions which he founded, have been, and are still to be, maintained, developed and advanced.

The witnesses are appropriate, and such as eminently befit the occasion.

The President of the United States is here, and feels, I am persuaded, that the official distinction which he lends to the scene has no higher personal charm, if any higher public dignity, than that which it derives from its associations with his earliest and most illustrious predecessor. "I hold the place which Washington held," must be a reflection capable of sustaining a Chief Magistrate under any and every weight of responsibility and care, and of elevating him to the pursuit of the purest and loftiest ends.

Representatives of foreign nations are here, ready to bear witness to the priceless example which America has given to the world, in the character of him whose fame has long since ceased to be the property of any country or of any age.

The Vice President and Senate, the Heads of Departments, the Judiciary, the Authorities of the City and District, the Officers of the army and navy and marines, from many a field and many a flood of earlier and of later fame; veterans of the line and volunteers; fresh from the scenes of trial and of triumph, with swords already wreathed with myrtles, which every patriot prays may prove as unfading as the laurels with which their brows are bound; all are here, eager to attest their reverence for the memory of one, whom statesmen and soldiers have conspired in pronouncing to have been first alike in Peace and in War.

The Representatives of the People are here; and it is only as their organ that I have felt it incumbent on me, in the midst of cares and duties which would have formed an ample apology for declining any other service, to say a few words on this occasion. Coming here in no official capacity, I yet feel that I bring with me the sanction not merely of the Representatives of the People, but of the People themselves, for all that I can say, and for much more than I can say, in honor of Washington.

And, indeed, the People themselves are here; in masses such as never before were seen within the shadows of the Capitol—a cloud of witnesses,—to bring their own heartfelt testimony to the occasion. From all the States of the Union: from all political parties; from all professions and occupations; men of all sorts and conditions; and those before whom men and conditions bow, as lending the chief ornament and grace to every scene of life; the people, as individual citizens, and in every variety of association, military and masonic, moral, collegiate, and charitable, Rechabites and Red Men, Sons of Temperance and Firemen, United Brothers and Odd Fellows; the people have come up this day to the temple gates of a common and glorious republic, to fraternize with each other in a fresh act of homage to the memory of the man, who was, and is, and will forever be, "first in the hearts of his countrymen!" Welcome, welcome, Americans all! "The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, (I borrow the words of Washington himself,) must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations."

Nor can I feel, fellow-citizens, that I have yet made mention of all who are with us at this hour. Which of us does not realise that unseen witnesses are around us? Think ye that the little band, whose feeble forms are spared to bless our sight once more, are all of the army of Washington, who are uniting with us in this tribute of reverence for his memory? Think ye, that the patriot soldiers or the patriot statesmen, who stood around him in war and in peace, are altogether absent from a scene like this. Adams and Jefferson, joint-authors of the Declaration, by whose lives and deaths this day has been doubly hallowed; Hamilton and Madison, joint-framers of the Constitution, present, visibly present, in the venerated persons of those nearest and dearest to them in life; Marshall, under whose auspices the work before us was projected, and whose classic pen had already constructed a mounment to his illustrious compeer and friend more durable than marble or granite; Knox, Lincoln and Green; Franklin, Jay, Pickering and Morris; Schuyler and Putnam, Stark and Prescott, Sumter and Marion, Steuben, Kosciusko and Lafayette; companions, counsellors, supporters, friends, followers of Washington, all, all; we hail them from their orbs on high, and feel that we do them no wrong in counting them among the gratified witnesses of this occasion!

But it is the precise epoch at which we have arrived in the word's history, and in our own history, which imparts to this occasion an interest and an importance which cannot easily be overestimated.

I can make but the merest allusion to the mighty movements which have recently taken place on the continent of Europe—where events which would have given character to an age have been crowded within the changes of a moon.

Interesting, intensely interesting, as these events have been to all who have witnessed them, they have been tenfold more interesting to Americans. We see in them the influence of our own institutions. We behold in them the results of our own example. We recognise them as the spontaneous germination and growth of seeds which have been wafted over the ocean, for half a century past, from our own original Liberty Tree!

The distinguished writer of the declaration which made this day memorable, was full of apprehensions as to the influence of the Old World upon the New. He even wished, on one occasion, that "an ocean of fire" might roll between America and Europe, to cut off and consume those serpent fascinations and seductions which were to corrupt, if not to strangle outright, our infant freedom in its cradle.

Doubtless these were no idle fears at the time. Doubtless there are dangers still, which might almost seem to have justified such a wish But it is plain that the currents of political influence thus far have run deepest and strongest in the opposite direction. The influence the new world upon the old is the great moral of the events of the day.

Mr. Jefferson's "ocean of fire" has, indeed, been almost realized. A tremendous enginery has covered the sea with smoke and flame. The fiery dragon has ceased to be a fable. The inspired description of Leviathan is fulfilled to the letter. "Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or caldron. His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth. He maketh the deep to boil like a pot; he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment."

But the Saint George of modern civilization and science, instead of slaying the dragon, has subdued him to the yoke, and broken him into the service of mankind. The ocean of fire has only facilitated the intercourse which it was invoked to destroy And the result is before the world.

New modes of communication, regular and more rapid interchanges of information and opinion, freer and more frequent comparisons of principles, of institutions, and of conditions, have at length brought the political systems of the two continents into conflict; and prostrate thrones and reeling empires this day bear witness to the shock!

Yes, fellow-citizens, (if I may be allowed the figure,) the great upward and downward trains on the track of human freedom have at last come into collision! It is too early as yet for any one to pronounce upon the precise consequences of the encounter. But we can see at a glance what engines have been shattered, and what engineers have been dashed from their seats. We can see, too, that the great American-built locomotive "Liberty" still holds on its course, unimpeded and unimpaired; gathering strength as it goes; developing new energies to meet new exigencies; and bearing along its imperial train of twenty millions of people with a speed which knows no parallel.

Nor can we fail to see that men are every where beginning to examine the model of this mighty engine, and that not a few have already begun to copy its construction and to imitate its machinery. The great doctrines of our own Revolution, that "all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness;" these fundamental maxims of the rights of men are proclaimed as emphatically this day in Paris as they were seventy-two years ago this day in Philadelphia.

And not in Paris alone. The whole civilized world resounds with American opinions and American principles. Every vale is vocal with them. Every mountain hath found a tongue for them.

—— Sonitum toto Germania cœlo
Audiit, et insolitis tremuerunt motibus Alpes.

Every where the people are heard calling their rulers to account and holding them to a just responsibility. Every where the cry is raised for the elective franchise, the trial by jury, the freedom of the press, written constitutions, representative systems, republican forms.

In some cases most fortunately the rulers themselves have not escaped some seasonable symptoms of the pervading fervor for freedom, and have nobly anticipated the demands of their subjects. To the sovereign Pontiff of the Roman States in particular belongs the honor of having led the way in the great movement of the day, and no American will withhold from him a cordial tribute of respect and admiration for whatever he has done or designed for the regeneration of Italy. Glorious indeed on the page of history will be the name of Pius IX. if the rise of another Rome shall be traced to his wise and liberal policy. Yet not less truly glorious, if his own authority should date its decline to his noble refusal to lend his apostolical sanction to a war of conquest.

For Italy, however, and for France, and for the whole European world alike, a great work still remains. A rational, practical, enduring liberty cannot be acquired in a paroxysm, cannot be established by a proclamation. It is not, our own history proves that it is not "The hasty product of a day,

But the well-ripened fruit of wise delay."

The redress of a few crying grievances, the reform of a few glaring abuses, the banishment of a minister, the burning of a throne, the overthrow of a dynasty, these are but scanty preparations for the mighty undertaking upon which they have entered. New systems are to be constructed; new forms to be established; new Governments to be instituted, organized, and administered, upon principles which shall reconcile the seeming conflict between liberty and law, and secure to every one the enjoyment of regulated constitutional freedom.

And it is at this moment, fellow-citizens, when this vast labor is about to be commenced, when the files of the Old World are searched in vain for precedents, and the file-leaders of the Old World are looked to in vain for pioneers, and when all eyes are strained to find the men, to find the man, who is sufficient for these things, it is at such a moment that we are assembled on this pinnacle of the American Republic—I might almost say by some Divine impulse and direction—to hold up afresh to the admiration and imitation of mankind the character and example of George Washington.

Let us contemplate that character and that example for a moment, and see whether there be any thing in all the treasures of our country's fame, I do not say merely of equal intrinsic value, but of such eminent adaptation to the exigencies of the time and the immediate wants of the world.

I will enter into no details of his personal history. Washington's birthday is a National Festival. His whole life, boyhood and manhood, has been learned by heart by us all. Who knows not that he was a self-made man? Who knows not that the only education which he enjoyed was that of the common schools of Virginia, which, at that day, were of the very commonest sort? Who remembers not those extraordinary youthful adventures, by which he was trained up to the great work of his destiny? Who remembers not the labors and exposures which he encountered as a land surveyor, at the early age of sixteen years? Who has forgotten the perils of his journey of forty-one days and five hundred and sixty miles, from Williamsburg to French Creek, when sent, at the age of only twenty-one, as commissioner from Gov. Dinwiddie, to demand of the French forces their authority for invading the King's dominions? Who has not followed him, a hundred times, with breathless anxiety, as he threads his way through that pathless wilderness, at one moment fired at by the Indians at fifteen paces, at the next wrecked upon a raft amid snow and ice, and subjected throughout to every danger which treacherous elements or still more treacherous enemies could involve? Who has forgotten his hardly less miraculous escape, a few years later, on the banks of the Monongahela, when foremost in that fearful fight, he was the only mounted officer of the British troops who was not either killed or desperately wounded?

Let me not speak of Washington as a merely self-made man. There were influences employed in moulding and making him, far, far above his own control. Bereft of his father at the tender age of eleven years, he had a mother left to whom the world can never over-estimate its debt. And higher, holier still, was the guardianship so signally manifested in more than one event of his life. "By the all-powerful dispensations of Providence," wrote Washington himself to his venerated parent after Braddock's defeat, "I have been protected beyond all human probability or expectation; for I had four bullets through my coat and two horses shot from under me; yet I escaped unhurt, although death was levelling my companions on every side of me." Well did the eloquent pastor of a neighboring parish, on his return, "point out to the public that heroic youth, Colonel Washington, whom (says he) I cannot but hope Providence has hitherto preserved in so signal a manner for some important service to the country."

And not less natural or less striking was the testimony of the Indian chief who told Washington, fifteen years afterwards, "that at the battle of the Monongahela he had singled him out as a conspicuous object, had fired his rifle at him many times, and directed his young warriors to do the same, but that, to his utter astonishment, none of their balls took effect; that he was then persuaded that the youthful hero was under the special guardianship of the Great Spirit, and immediately ceased to fire at him; and that he was now come to pay homage to the man who was the particular favorite of Heaven, and who could never die in battle."

Our Revolutionary fathers had many causes for adoring the invisible hand by which they were guided and guarded in their great struggle for liberty; but none, none stronger than this providential preparation and preservation of their destined Chief. Be it ours to prolong that anthem of gratitude which may no more be heard from their mute lips: "The grave cannot praise Thee; death cannot celebrate Thee; but the living, the living, they shall praise Thee, as we do this day!"

Of the public services of Washington to our own country, for which he was thus prepared and preserved, it is enough to say that in the three great epochs of our national history he stands forth pre-eminent and peerless, the master-spirit of the time.

In the war of the Revolution we see him the leader of our armies.

In the formation of the Constitution we see him the President of our Councils.

In the organization of the Federal Government we see him the Chief Magistrate of our Republic.

Indeed, from the memorable day when, under the unheard but by no means inauspicious salute of both British and American batteries, engaged in no holiday exercise on Bunker Hill, it was unanimously resolved that George Washington, having been chosen commander-in-chief of such forces as are or shall be raised for the maintenance and preservation of American liberty, "this Congress doth now declare that they will maintain and assist him, and adhere to him, the said George Washington, with their lives and fortunes in the same cause;" from this ever-memorable 17th of June, 1775—a day on which (as has been well said) Providence kept an even balance with the cause, and while it took from us a Warren gave a Washington—to the 14th day of December, 1799, when he died, we shall search the annals of our land in vain for any important scene in which he was any thing less than the principal figure.

It is, however, the character of Washington, and not the mere part which he played, which we would hold up this day to the world as worthy of endless and universal commemoration. The highest official distinctions may be enjoyed, and the most important public services rendered, by men whose lives will not endure examination. It is the glory of Washington that the virtues of the man outshone even the brilliancy of his acts, and that the results which he accomplished were only the legitimate exemplifications of the principles which he professed and cherished

In the whole history of the world it may be doubted whether any man can be found who has exerted a more controlling influence over men and over events than George Washington. To what did he owe that influence? How did he win, how did he wield, that magic power, that majestic authority, over the minds and hearts of his countrymen and of mankind? In what did the power of Washington consist?

It was not the power of vast learning or varied acquirements. He made no pretensions to scholarship, and had no opportunities for extensive reading.

It was not the power of sparkling wit, or glowing rhetoric. Though long associated with deliberative bodies, he never made a set speech in his life, nor ever mingled in a stormy debate.

It was not the power of personal fascination.—There was little about him of that gracious affability which sometimes lends such resistless attraction to men of commanding position. His august presence inspired more of awe than of affection, and his friends. numerous and devoted as they were, were bound to him rather by ties of respect than of love.

It was not the power of a daring and desperate spirit of heroic adventure. "If I ever said so," replied Washington, when asked whether he had said that there was something charming in the sound of a whistling bullet; "if I ever said so, it was when I was young." He had no passion for mere exploits. He sought no bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth. With a courage never questioned, and equal to every exigency, he had yet "a wisdom which die guide his valor to act in safety."

In what, then, did the power of Washington consist? When Patrick Henry returned home from the first continental Congress, and was asked who was the greatest man in that body, he replied: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, is the greatest orater; but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Col. Washington is by far the greatest man on that floor."

When, fifteen years earlier, Washington, at the close of the French war, took his seat for the first time in the House of Burgesses of Virginia, and a vote of thanks was presented to him for his military services to the Colony, his hesitation and embarrassment were relieved by the Speaker, who said, "Sit down, Mr. Washington, your modesty equals your valor; and that surpasses the power of any language that I possess."

But it was not solid information or sound judgment, or even that rare combination of surpassing modesty and valor, great as these qualities are, which gave Washington such a hold on the regard, respect, and confidence of the American people. I hazard nothing in saying that it was the high moral elements of his character which imparted to it its prepondering force. His incorruptible honesty, his uncompromising truth, his devout reliance on God, the purity of his life, the scrupulousness of his conscience, the disinterestedness of his purposes, his humanity, generosity, and justice—these were the ingredients which, blending harmoniously with solid information and sound judgment and a valor only equalled by his modesty, made up a character to which the world may be fearlessly challenged for a parallel.

"Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire. conscience," was one of a series of maxims which Washington framed or copied for his own use when a boy. His rigid adherence to principle, his steadfast discharge of duty, his utter abandonment of self, his unreserved devotion to whatever interests were committed to his care, attest the more than vestal vigilance with which he obeyed that maxim. He kept alive that spark. He made it shine before men. He kindled it into a flame which illumined his whole life. No occasion was so momentous, no circumstances so minute, as to absolve him from following its guiding ray. The marginal explanation in his account book, in regard to the expenses of his wife's annual visit to the camp during the revolutionary war, with his passing allusion to the "self-denial" which the exigencies of his country had cost him, furnishes a charming illustration of his habitual exactness. The fact that every barrel of flour which bore the brand of "George Washington, Mount Vernon," was exempted from the otherwise uniform inspection in the West India ports—that name being regarded as an ample guaranty of the quality and quantity of any article to which it was affixed—supplies a not less striking proof that his exactness was every where understood.

Every body saw that Washington sought nothing for himself. Every body knew that he sacrificed nothing to personal or to party ends. Hence, the mighty influence, the matchless sway which he exercised over all around him. "He was the only man in the United States who possessed the confidence of all, (said Thomas Jefferson;) there was no other one who was considered any thing more than a party leader."

Who ever thinks of Washington as a mere politician? Who ever associates him with the petty arts and pitiful intrigues of partisan office-seekers or partisan office-holders? Who ever pictures him canvassing for votes, dealing out proscription, or doling out patronage?

"No part of my duty," wrote Washington to Governor Bowdoin, in a letter, the still unpublished original of which is a precious inheritance of my own: "No part of my duty will be more delicate, and in many instances more unpleasant, than that of nominating and appointing persons to office. It will undoubted happen that there will be several candidates for the same office, whose pretensions, abilities, and integrity may be nearly equal, and who will come forward so equally supported in every respect as almost to require the aid of supernatural intuition to fix upon the right. I shall, however, in all events, have the satisfaction to reflect that I entered upon my administration unconfined by a single engagement, uninfluenced by any ties of blood or friendship, and with the best intention and fullest determination to nominate to office those persons only who, upon every consideration, were the most deserving, and who would probably execute their several functions to the interest and credit of the American Union; if such characters could be found by my exploring every avenue of information respecting their merits and pretensions that it was in my power to obtain."

And there was as little of the vulgar hero about him, as there was of the mere politician. At the head of a victorious army, of which he was the idol—an army too often provoked to the very verge of mutiny by the neglect of an inefficient Government—we find him the constant counsellor of subordination and submission to the civil authority. With the sword of a conqueror at his side, we find him the unceasing advocate of peace. Repeatedly invested with more than the power of a Roman dictator, we see him receiving that power with reluctance, employing it with the utmost moderation, and eagerly embracing the earliest opportunity to resign it. The offer of a Crown could not, did not, tempt him for an instant from his allegiance to liberty. He rejected it with indignation and abhorrence, and proceeded to devote all his energies and all his influence, all his popularity and all his ability, to the establishment of that Republican System, of which he was from the first to the last the uncompromising advocate, and with the ultimate success of which he believed the best interests of America and of the world were inseparably connected.

It is thus that, in contemplating the character of Washington, the offices which he held, the acts which he performed, his success as a statesman, his triumphs as a soldier, almost fade from our sight. It is not the Washington of the Delaware, or the Brandywine, of Germantown or of Monmouth; it is not Washington, the President of the Convention, or the President of the republic, which we admire. We cast our eyes over his life, not to be dazzled by the meteoric lustre of particular passages, but to behold its whole pathway radiant, radiant every where, with the true glory of a just, conscientious, consummate man! Of him we feel it to be no exaggeration to say that "all the ends he aimed at Were his Country's, his God's, and Truth's."

Of him we feel it to be no exaggeration to say, that he stands upon the page of history the great modern illustration and example of that exquisite and Divine precept, which fell from the lips of the dying Monarch of Israel—

"He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God;
"And he shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds!"

And now, fellow-citizens, it is this incomparable and transcendant character, which America, on this occasion, holds up afresh to the admiration of mankind. Believing it to be the only character which could have carried us safely through our own Revolutionary struggles, we present it, especially, this day, to the wistful gaze of convulsed and distracted Europe. May we not hope that there may be kindred spirits over the sea, upon whom the example may impress itself, till they shall be inflamed with a noble rage to follow it?—Shall we not call upon them to turn from a vain reliance upon their old idols, and to behold here, in the mingled moderation and courage, in the combined piety and patriotism, in the blended virtue, principle, wisdom, valor, self-denial, and self-devotion of our Washington, the express image of the man, the only man, for their occasion?

Daphni, quid antiquos signorum suspicis ortus,
Ecce Diomi processit Cæsaris astrum!

Let us rejoice that our call is anticipated.—Washington is no new name to Europe. His star has been seen in every sky, and wise men every where have done it homage. To what other merely human being, indeed, has such homage ever before or since been rendered?

"I have a large acquaintance among the most valuable and exalted classes of men," wrote Erskine to Washington himself, "but you are the only being for whom I ever felt an awful reverence."

"Illustrious man!" said Fox of him, in the British House of Commons in 1794, "deriving honor less from the splendor of his situation than from the dignity of his mind; before whom all borrowed greatness sinks into insignificance, and all the potentates of Europe become little and contemptible."

"Washington is dead!" proclaimed Napoleon, on hearing of the event. "This great man fought against tyranny; he established the liberty of his country. His memory will be always dear to the French people, as it will be to all free men of the two worlds."

"It will be the duty of the historian and the sage in all ages," says Lord Brougham, "to let no occasion pass of commemorating this illustrious man; and, until time shall be no more, will a test of the progress which our race has made in wisdom and virtue be derived from the veneration paid to the immortal name of Washington."

"One thing is certain," says Guizot—"one thing is certain: that which Washington did—the founding of a free Government, by order and peace, at the close of the Revolution—no other policy than his could have accomplished."

And later, better still: "Efface henceforth the name of Machiavel," said Lamartine, within a few weeks past, in his reply to the Italian Association—"efface henceforth the name of Machiavel from your titles of glory, and substitute for it the name of Washington; that is the one which should now be proclaimed; that is the name of modern liberty. It is no longer the name of a politician or a conqueror that is required; it is that of a man, the most disinterested, the most devoted to the people. This is the man required by liberty. The want of the age is a European Washington!"

And who shall supply that want but he who so vividly realizes it? Enthusiastic, eloquent, admirable Lamartine! Though the magic wires may even now be trembling with the tidings of his downfall, we will not yet quite despair of him.—Go on in the high career to which you have been called! Fall in it, if it must be so; but fall not, falter not, from it! Imitate the character you have so nobly appreciated! Fulfil the pledges you have so gloriously given! Plead still against the banner of blood! Strive still against the reign of terror! Aim still

"By winning words to conquer willing hearts,
And make persuasion do the work of fear!"

May a gallant and generous people second you, and the Power which preserved Washington sustain you, until you have secured peace, order, freedom to your country!

"Si qua fata aspera rumpas,
Tu Marcellus eris.'

But, fellow-citizens, while we thus commend the character and example of Washington to others, let us not forget to imitate it ourselves. I have spoken of the precise period which we have reached in our own history, as well as in that of the world at large, as giving something of peculiar interest to the proceedings in which we are engaged. I may not, I will not disturb the harmony of the scene before me by the slightest allusion of a party character. The circumstances of the occasion forbid it; the associations of the day forbid it; the character of him in whose honor we are assembled forbids it; my own feelings revolt from it. But I may say, I must say, and every one within the sound of my voice will sustain me in saying, that there has been no moment since Washington himself was among us, when it was more important than at this moment that the two great leading principles of his policy should be remembered and cherished.

Those principles were, first, the most complete, cordial, and indissoluble Union of the States; and second, the most entire separation and disentanglement of our own country from all other countries. Perfect union among ourselves, perfect neutrality towards others, and peace, peace, domestic peace and foreign peace, as the result; this was the chosen and consummate policy of the Father of his Country.

But above all and before all in the heart of Washington was the Union of the States; and no opportunity was ever omitted by him, to impress upon his fellow-citizens the profound sense which he entertained of its importance at once to their prosperity and their liberty.

In that incomparable address in which he bade farewell to his countrymen at the close of his Presidential service, he touched upon many other topics with the earnestness of a sincere conviction. He called upon them, in solemn terms, to "cherish public credit;" to "observe good faith and justice towards all nations;" avoiding both "inveterate antipathies and passionate attachments" towards any; to mitigate and assuage the unquenchable fire of party spirit, "lest, instead of warming, it should consume;" to abstain from "characterizing parties by geographical distinctions;" "to promote institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge;" to respect and uphold "religion and morality; those great pillars of human happiness, those firmest props of the duties of men and of citizens."

But what can exceed, what can equal the accumulated intensity of thought and of expression with which he calls upon them to cling to the union of the States. "It is of infinite moment," says he, in langnage which we ought never to be weary of hearing or of repeating, "that you should properly estimate the immense value of your National Union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

The Union, the Union in any event, was thus the sentiment of Washington. The Union, the Union in any event, let it be our sentiment this day!

Yes, to-day, fellow-citizens, at the very moment when the extension of our boundaries and the multiplication of our territories are producing, directly and indirectly, among the different members of our political system, so many marked and mourned centrifugal tendencies, let us seize this occasion to renew to each other our vows of allegiance and devotion to the American Union, and let us recognize in our common title to the name and the fame of Washington, and in our common veneration for his example and his advice, the all-sufficient centripetal power, which shall hold the thick clustering stars of our confederacy in one glorious constellation forever! Let the column which we are about to construct be at once a pledge and an emblem of perpetual union! Let the foundations be laid, let the superstructure be built up and cemented, let each stone be raised and riveted, in a spirit of national brotherhood! And may the earliest ray of the rising sun—till that sun shall set to rise no more—draw forth from it daily, as from the fabled statue of antiquity, a strain of national harmony, which shall strike a responsive chord in every heart throughout the Republic!

Proceed, then, fellow-citizens, with the work for which you have assembled! Lay the cornerstone of a monument which shall adequately bespeak the gratitude of the whole American People to the illustrious Father of his Country! Build it to the skies; you cannot outreach the loftiness of his principles! Found it upon the massive and eternal rock; you cannot make it more enduring than his fame! Construct it of the peerless Parian marble; you cannot make it purer than his life!—Exhaust upon it the rules and principles of ancient and of modern art; you cannot make it more proportionate than his character!

But let not your homage to his memory end here. Think not to transfer to a tablet or a column the tribute which is due from yourselves.—Just honor to Washington can only be rendered by observing his precepts and imitating his example. Similitudine decoremus. He has built his own monument. We and those who come after us in successive generations are its appointed, its privileged guardians. This wide-spread Republic is the true monument to Washington. Maintain its Independence. Uphold its Constitution. Preserve its Union. Defend its Liberty. Let it stand before the world in all its original strength and beauty, securing peace, order, equality, and freedom to all within its boundaries, and shedding light, and hope and joy upon the pathway of human liberty throughout the world; and Washington needs no other monument. Other structures may fitly testify our veneration for him, this, this alone can adequately illustrate his services to mankind.

Nor does he even need this. The Republic may perish; the wide arch of our ranged Union may fall; star by star its glories may expire; stone by stone its columns and its capitol may moulder and crumble; all other names which adorn its annals may be forgotten; but as long as human hearts shall any where pant, or human tongues shall any where plead, for a true, rational, constitutional liberty, those hearts shall enshrine the memory, and those tongues prolong the fame, of GEORGE WASHINGTON!

Cowper as a Descriptive Poet.

Good descriptive poetry requires great genius and most refined taste. The beauty and spirit of description consist in proper selection and arrangement; if too concise, the idea of the object will be confused; if too minute, the description will be tedious and disgusting. It must impress upon the mind a full idea of the object, by presenting the most striking parts, and leaving the minute to be supplied by the imagination. The taste and genius of the poet are displayed in so introducing these circumstances, as to preserve the harmony of the picture. Description must be natural and original, to be interesting; and on this account, few poets have excelled in this department.

For simplicity and correctness in description, Cowper is generally acknowledged to be unrivaled. In his descriptions, we see no attempts at display; no legendary fictions are connected with his plains and groves; a beautiful reality pervades the whole. He consulted none of his predecessors for subjects, but took them from nature. He is natural without laboring to shun the opposite; and original with no effort to avoid imitation.—His descriptions of some of the human passions, show his extensive knowledge of human nature; and the manner in which he touches upon the follies of his age, his acquaintance with human conduct. He was an ardent admirer of rural scenery, and with this his descriptions are chiefly connected. In his landscapes, there is nothing superfluous, and there seems to be nothing wanting; and so vividly are they presented to the view, that when he comes to the "Tall spire, from which the sound of cheerful bells

Just undulates upon the listening ear," the unconscious reader detects himself, just ready to turn his head to catch the dying sound.

Cowper does not attempt to raise a low or common object, but applies to it such language as will make it appear natural. Of this kind is the mail-carrier in a snow storm, who,

"With half shut eyes, and puckered cheeks, and teeth Presented bare against the storm, plods on."

Also the woodman going to his task;

"Shaggy and lean, and shrewd, with pointed ears
His dog attends him. Close behind his heel
Now creeps he slow, and now with many a frisk
Wide scampering, snatches up the drifted snow
With ivory teeth, or ploughs it with his snout;
Then shakes his powdered coat, and barks for joy.
Heedless of all his pranks, the sturdy churl
Moves right towards the mark."

Our author knew the inconstancy of earthly renown, as may be seen in his statesman:

"The rabble, all alive,
From toppling benches, cellars, stalls and sties,
Swarm in the streets. The statesman of the day,
A pompous and slow moving pageant, comes.
Some shout him, and some hang upon his car,
To gaze in his eyes, and bless him. Maidens waive
Their 'kerchiefs, and old women weep for joy.
——But the wane is near,
And his own cattle must suffice him soon."

When the subject requires, Cowper can elevate his style. The effects of the earthquakes on Sicily, may be considered an example:

"Her palaces are dust. In all her streets
The voice of singing and the sprightly chord
Are silent. Revelry, and dance and show
Suffer a syncope and solemn pause,
While God performs upon the trembling stage
Of his own works, his dreadful part alone."

Thomson, the most celebrated descriptive poet, is not always so chaste and natural as Cowper.—He occasionally indulges his imagination somewhat, while Cowper is true to nature. In describing the effects of frost upon the cascade, Thomson represents it as congealing the water in its descent:

——"The dumb cascade Whose idle torrents only seem to roar."

But Cowper makes it appear natural.

"No frost can bind it there; its utmost force
Can but arrest the light and smoky mist
That, in its fall, the liquid sheet spreads wide."

Thomson's descriptions have an ideal beauty, but Cowper's "have an unrivalled charm of truth and reality." W. L. E.

KALAMAZOO, Mich.

The ancient Mexican idols, with their sacrificial basins, have arrived in this city. They are the finest and the most interesting specimens of American antiquity ever brought to the United States. A series of lectures will be given next season by our most eloquent and learned men, on the antiquities of our own country. The idols above referred to are intended to illustrate them. The object of these lectures will be for the purpose of raising funds, preparatory to establishing an asylum in this city for respectable destitute females.—N. O. Picayune.

STEAMER QUEEN CITY,
Lake Michigan, July 4, 1848.

MR. EDITOR: You see I am spending the Fourth on the water—on one of the great lakes of our great country. I am, and have of late been, placed in circumstances to contemplate the magnitude and increasing greatness of this, my native land: nor have I ever felt more proud of my country or more patriotic than I feel today.

When, on the Fourth of July, 1776, our fathers, in the face and eyes of the sternest and mightiest monarchy that then cursed the earth, declared that "these united Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States," notwithstanding the greatness of their minds and the strength of their imaginations, I do not think they even half realized what would be the rapidity of the growth, and what the destiny, in point of greatness, of the new-born Republic. Our nation could then boast of no prophetic bard, and the visions of all other mortals have been more than realized. Less than three fourths of a century has since passed away, and the original Thirteen States have been more than doubled; from a handful of freemen we have become twenty millions; and the shouts for liberty that then went up to Heaven along the coast of the Atlantic with no response from the far and almost boundless West, is re-echoed today by the children of the Revolutionary fathers, not only between Plymouth Rock and the southern streams of Georgia, but around and on our vast inland seas; in the great valley of the Mississippi, that cradle where is being rocked that still infant Hercules of American Enterprise; on the beeting crags of the Rocky Mountains; and where the waves of the Pacific are stayed by the Heaven-built walls of granite that protect the coast of Oregon. Cities have taken the place of solitary wigwams; steamboats, whose frame work exhibits the noblest impress of mechanic art, and whose spacious area enfolds the annual products of hundreds of freemen, and bears them onward to the mart of trade with a speed that mocks the agility of the well-trained land courser, have supplanted the rude little barque of uncivilized indolence; and the trail of the unlettered forest ranger, has been surmounted by the metalic track of the iron horse, and the whole overtopped by the path which unshackled genius has constructed for the harnessed lightning.

Truly the spirit of enterprise is "lengthening the cords" of this young and already mighty Republic; and the shouts of freemen will mingle today, from limits which make the imagination sublime to survey. The Declaration of Independence has been read on a steamboat named for a city which, though containing more than forty thousand inhabitants, had but a name a quarter of a century ago; it has been read on a lake which had not, perhaps, been crossed by a white man when that immortal document was promulgated to the world, but which is now whitened with the sails of commerce, and beautified and gladdened on its shores by thriving villages and by cities even, which seem to have been "born in a day," and it has been read in the presence alike of the New England pedlar, the southern planter, the saw-mill builder from the St. Croix, the huntsman from the Lake of the Woods, the farmer from the base of the Rocky Mountains, and the trapper from the branches of the Oregon. To all of them it is the gospel of their civil rights; and under its fostering power, they wander at large and without molestation, from lake to lake, from river to river, and from ocean to ocean. Glorious document! it is pregnant with immortal principles; and these principles, which are the leaven of the civil world, though slow in their operation, are certain, and will prove effectual. Europe, at this very hour, is upheaved by them, and other portions of the earth are feeling their mighty and irresistable influence. God grant that this leaven, small in its beginning, may continue to spread in its operations, until the whole great globe shall be quietly and peacefully, yet speedily and thoroughly "leavened."

Yours in the bonds of patriotism, J. C.

ARTIFICIAL COLORING OF FLOWERS, BY THEIR ABSORPTION OF VEGETABLE JUICES.

The artificial coloring of flowers, by the above named process, though not yet extensively practiced, is a process not less curious than instructive. Mons. Bier recently laid before the Academy of Sciences, at Paris, some specimens of this, which commanded no little attention.—Among these were the white hyacinth, and white roses, the petals of both of which were beautifully marked with fine red lines. This Savant had tried a great variety of experiments, in the matter, some of which produced most singular results. Most coloring matters he found to penetrate plants but slightly, and others not at all; while many became wholly changed, or decomposed in passing through the vessels of the vegatable tissues. But the most ramarkable fact, perhaps, which he encountered was, that while many plants obstinately refused the injection, others were penetrated with great rapidity; and yet the places of these plants in the Natural System of Botany, in no wise either suggested or explained these differences. For instance, a few minutes, only, were sufficient to mark, with a multitude of fine, red lines, a white Monthly Rose, while a Musk Rose, equally white, experienced no change of color; and even flowers upon the same plant, he found to exhibit these extreme opposites. Where the experiment did succeed, the observer was able to note its exact progress, and to determine, by the eye, at any moment, the extent of that progress—thus rendering visible the course and size of the exceedingly minute vessels through which nutrition is distributed to all parts of flowers.—For coloring the flowers laid before the French Acadamy, as mentioned above, Mons. Bior employed the expressed juice of Phytolaca decandra, (the Poke weed,) and this was sprinkled upupon the ground in which the plant, in blossom, was growing. The red color began to appear, in the blossoms, in most cases, in about an hour.—The color thus given is not permanent, but disappears after a few days exposure of the growing plant in the sun.

As this is the season of flowers, will not the ladies of our city, who have already so largely interested our people with their monthly exhibitions of fruits and flowers, still farther amuse themselves and instruct the public by some of these strange and peculiar artificial preparations? If I mistake not, their monthly fairs might be greatly heightened, in interest, by exhibitions of this kind, if prepared by the ladies, themselves, and accompanied with full descriptions of the processes and the results. R. W. HASKINS.

FRUIT PROSPECTS IN ENGLAND.—The following extract from a late London letter in the Courier & Enquirer, may contain matter of some interest to the growers of fine fruit in Western New York and on the Lake shore. If our farmers generally, would pay more attention than they do to the cultivation of choice fruit, and putting it up properly for market, we have no doubt they would find their profits greatly enhanced:

The apple and pear orchards of England are failures for this year at least, and many of the trees are so injured, that they will die altogether. It therefore behoves the farmers of the States to take much care of those fruits, and to thin their crops, that the apples which may arrive at maturity, shall all be the best of their kind, and in good condition. The fruit trade here is a very large one. So much so, that many persons devote their attention exclusively to a single fruit; as for instance in the cherry orchards of Kent; and in this instance the cherry is of a singular kind, (the Kentish cherry,) and that a sour, thin, poor cherry, only fit for pies, and never introduced into desserts. This cherry has been in luck in several ways—first, we are indebted for our earliest knowledge of the effect of manure to the fact that a farmer in Kent used to throw open his orchards to the herds of bullocks on their way to the London markets; and observed that in those years in which he did so, he had better crops and finer fruit than in others; and he made known his observations; and in course of time Guano at £16 per ton, became one of the results. Another piece of luck for the cherry was the reduction of the duty on sugar, converting the poor farmers into men of comparative wealth.—Formerly, the fruit which could not be sold, was given to the pigs; now it is preserved—formerly the fruit being sown, the rich only could afford to have the requisite amount of sugar to eat with it; now it forms a portion of the Sunday's dinner to the poorest artizan. The same remark applies to the apple. By the laws of England, all preserves from foreign countries, into which sugar is introduced, pay a very heavy tax—six pence per pound. Is there not some speculating ingenious Yankee, who has the desire to lay the foundation of a fortune for himself and his family, ("a name for this as well as a future generation") by introducing American apples in some mode hy which they can be preserved for table use in England, during the winter, without the use of sugar? The dried apples—both whole and in slices, (duty two shillings and sixpence per cwt.,) are bro't from the Continent; and as they are introduced year after year, one can only suppose that the importation of them must be lucrative. It will, however, be requisite to avoid the great fault of all of Jonathan's exports; a practical belief that quantity not quality is the one thing requisite; and that if he sends a mass from his wharves it will be sufficient—regardless alike of the condition in which it may arrive, and of the probability of its pleasing the eye of the purchaser. The dried Apples from the Continent arrive in beautiful and clean baskets of wicker work, containing from six to ten pounds; each apple chosen for sit soundness, and the whole of them assorted in sizes and ranged in rows, with all the neatness of a spinster's work box.

New Gleanings from Old Fields.

NUMBER TWO.

KALAMAZOO, June 24th.

Pleasantly the week has passed away. Friendly greetings from old acquaintances are, under all circumstances, gratifying to the feelings and healthy to the spirit; and when such greetings are new and numerous every day, the participant lives fast and enjoys much. It is no doubt a source of pride for the citizens of the several villages along the Central Railroad to welcome, on their own grounds, their eastern friends. The thriftiness and beauty of these "miniature towns" is indubitable evidence that the country is rich and that Enterprise is the most important "settler."

The additional college building which has been erected for the State University at Ann Arbor the past year, has destroyed the loneliness of the first and, till now, the only dormitory, and added a new charm to the already beautiful college grounds: and when the building for the medical department—the foundation of which has lately been laid—is completed, Ann Arbor will be still more attractive.

The mechanic and artizan are busy at Jackson, Albion, Marshall and Battle Creek, erecting additional dwelling houses and shops and mills, etc. for business; and Industry seems to be the empress of every place. Plans are in operation for the establishment of a Female department in the noted Academy at Albion, of a higher order than hitherto enjoyed there, and indeed of a higher order than has yet been found in the State. A course of studies similar to that of females at Oberlin, Ohio, will be laid out, and diplomas will be given the same as to male graduates in colleges. Such an institution will do much to elevate the character of female education in this growing state—a project highly commendable any where. The school will be under the patronage of the Methodist denomination, though open for the admission of all persuasions.

To morrow is the Sabbath; and how pleasant it will be to spend it here in Kalamazoo, the Arcadia of the Peninsula State. The Sabbath! it is a welcome day any where. It "is God's special present to the working man, and that one chief object is to prolong his life and preserve efficien his working tone. In the vital system it acts like a compensation-pond: it replenishes the spirits, the elasticity, and vigor, which the last six days have drained away, and supplies the force which is to fill the six days succeeding. And in the economy of existence it answers the same purpose as, in the economy of income, is answered by a Savings' Bank. The frugal man who puts aside a pound to-day, and another pound next month, and who in a quiet way is always putting past his stated pound from time to time, when he grows old and frail, gets not only the same pounds back again, but a good many pounds besides.—And the conscientious man who husbands one day of existence every week—who, instead of allowing the Sabbath to be trampled and torn in the hurry and scramble of life, treasures it devoutly up—the Lord of the Sabbath keeps it for him, and in length of days and a hale old age gives it back with usury. The Savings Bank of human existence is the weekly Sabbath-day."

CHICAGO, June 27th.

Were we about to make a voyage around the world, we should want no better master of the craft in which we were to sail, than Captain S. CLEMENT of the steamer Samuel Ward, which runs between St. Joseph and Chicago. Thorough seamanship and the gentleman are combined in his qualities, and we have never heard him named but to be praised.

We would like to have had a full survey of Michigan City, where the Ward halted at noon to-day, but this is an age of short stops. We merely learned that the place, which lies in the north-west corner of Indiana, in the county of La Port, has been settled about eighteen years; that it contains something like one thousand inhabitants; has three churches and eight or ten ware houses, and that 500,000 bushels of wheat were shipped there last year. Should the Michigan Central Railroad be extended from New-Buffalo around the lake to Chicago, it will pass thro' this place.

To say that we have been well pleased to-night in visiting the hall where the June exhibition of the Chicago Horticultural Society is being held, only half expresses our feelings. To find one's self amidst a profusion of choice and tempting fruits; flowers that seem to be exhaling themselves in odor; and beauties of the city, huddled by the dozen in different parts of the room, all smiling as Aurora and lovely as the nymphs of Calypso—it is too much for an humble votary of the quill to enjoy at one time. But it will do to dream over; so once more to the world, good-night.

AVON SPRINGS.—We learn, privately, that Avon Springs are receiving an unusual number of visitors this season. We are not surprised, for they are in a lovely, healthy and health-improving place. Our friend COMSTOCK of the Eagle hotel, is no doubt full of business about these times.

PUBLICATIONS FROM THE WEST.—We have received from Mr. I. A. HOPKINS, bookseller and publisher at Milwaukee, Wis., Sketches of the West, or Home of the Badgers, consisting of sprightly letters, which embrace much of the early history of Wisconsin, together with a map of the state; Wisconsin, its Geography and Topography, second edition, enlarged, embracing the geology and mineralogy of the State, and also sketches of its natural history, antiquities, productions, etc. etc. By I. A. LAPHAM: New Form Book, or Every Man's Legal Assistant, "containing the most useful forms of legal instruments to be found in any work of the size in the United States, and adapted to the wants of business men, to which is added the patent laws and forms, coin tables, bookkeeping, and the new Constitution of Wisconsin;" and A Phrase Book of English and German, with a literal translation of German into the English. The above works are for sale at Peck's and Breed's bookstores, and at the literary depots of Messrs. Burke and Hawks.

FRANCE, its King, Court and Government. By an American (GENERAL CASS.) Third edition. New York: Leonard Scott, 79 Fulton st. 1848.

The new edition of this much-talked-of pamphlet, makes its appearance just in the nick of time. The political friends and opponents of Gen. Cass will seize the work with fresh and like avidity, the one class to praise it indiscriminately, the other to convert it into political capital to operate against its author. "Single copies, 25 cts. 5 copies and upwards, 20 cts. each. 25 copies and upwards, 18¾ cts. 50 copies and upwards, 16¾ cents; or $16 a hundred. Money remitted by mail, either in coin or bank notes, to be post paid. The TRADE supplied on liberal terms."

For sale by Burke.

MR. JAMES E. MCKNIGHT, teller of the Bank of Attica, who was drowned in the Niagara river on the Fourth, was found on Monday, drifted ashore on Grand Island. The dreadful catastrophe occurred about three miles above that place.

MR. W. R. EDWARDS, of Jackson, Mich. is authorized to act as agent for the Western Literary Messenger.

T. S. HAWKS, has the Horticulturist and Knickerbocker for July.

THE PEACE MESSAGE of the President was sent into Congress on the 6th instant. The ratification of the treaty will be hailed with joy over all the land. Touching the territory acquired by the war the President remarks as follows:

New Mexico and U. California have been ceded by Mexico to the United States, and now constitute a part of our country. Embracing nearly ten degrees of latitude, lying adjacent to the Oregon Territory, and extending from the Pacific to the Rio Grande,—a mean distance of nearly 1000 miles, it would be difficult to estimate the value of these possessions to the United States. They constitute a country large enough for a great empire.

* * * Rich in mineral and agricultural resources, with a climate of great salubrity, they embrace the most important ports on the Pacific coost.

The possession of the ports of San Diego and the Bay of San Francisco will enable the United States to command the entire commerce of the Pacific. The number of our whale ships employed in that sea exceed seven hundred—requiring now more than 20,000 seamen to navigate them—while the capital invested in this particular branch of commerce is estimated at not less than $40,000,000.—The excellent harbors of Upper California will, under our flag, afford security and repose to our commercial marine—and American mechanics will soon furnish ready means of ship building and repair, which are now so much wanted in that distant sea.

By the acquisition of these possessions we are brought into immediate proximity with the west coast of America, from Cape Horn to the Russian possessions north of Oregon; with the Islands of the Pacific ocean; and by a direct voyage in steamers, we will be in less than thirty days of Canton and other ports of China.

In this vast region, whose rich resources are soon to be developed by American energy and enterprise, great must be the augmentation of our commerce; and with it new and profitable demands for mechanic labor in all its branches, and new and valuable markets for our manufactures and agricultural products.

Interesting Trial.

From the Detroit Daily Advertiser.

A trial is now progressing in the United States Court for this District, (Judge McLean presiding,) which is creating a good deal of interest by reason of its important relation to the law relative to the re-capture of runaway Slaves. The suit is brought against several of the most influential men of Marshall, in this State, for opposing the retaking of several fugitive Slaves in that village during the winter of 1847, by the authorized agent of their owner, a citizen of Kentucky. The opposition is alleged to have been so great on the part of these citizens as to have resulted in the flight of the Slaves from the village, and a consequent loss of their value, which is estimated at $2,800. Suit is brought against the defendants for the recovery of this amount, in the name of the owner. The principal witness for the plaintif was the person who attempted the recovery of the Slaves, and he was kept upon the stand for the space of 29 hours. The testimony for the plaintif is yet progressing, and the trial bids fair to continue for a week to come. Some of our most eminent counsel have been retained by the defendants, while the prosecution is conducted by Mr. Pratt, of Marshall, assisted by John Norvell, Esq., United States District Attorney. This being the first time, if we mistake not, that a question of this kind has arisen within the limits of our State, the result is looked forward to with a good deal of anxiety, especially by that portion of the community who are desirous of rendering just as small an amount of assistance to Slave-holders who come among us on such errands as they possibly can without incurring the penalty of law.

FRANCE.—Paris is still agitated. The resignation of Louis Napoleon postponed the trouble for the present. Six candidates for President are already in the field. M. Lamartine, Thiers, Prince Louis Bounaparte, M. Marent, Gn. Cavaignac and M. Caussidiere, ex-Prefect of Police,

The Orleans party will support M. Thiers and Berryer has declared in his favor. The Legitimists are divided between M. Thiers and Lamartine.

If the elections were soon to take place, little dout exists that Louis Buonaparte would be the successful candidate. The feeling exhibited by the French people in his favor leaves no doubt that in the event of a Presidential election, in almost every electoral college he will have a majority. Accordingly the Constitution has already been altered to meet this first difficulty in its working, and the President, instead of being elected directly by the people, unless he has an absolute majority of the votes given, is to be elected by the National Assembly, from five persons returned by the people.

The election of Prince Louis Napoleon, as Col. of the 4th Legion of the National Guards, of the Baulcue, vice d'Altenshee, resigned, has been definitely declared.

A new pretender is spoken of in the person of Prince Leuchtenberg, son of Prince Eugene, and son-in-law of the Emperor of Russia.

DENMARK.—War in Denmark continues unabated. At a conference of the Kings of Sweden and Denmark at Copenhagen, which was attended by the British Minister, the Russians, in behalf of Denmark, domanded that the Germans should evacuate both Duchies before any negotiations were entered into, and that if Schleswig was given up, Russia retained Holstein, according to the treaty with the Danes and Paul.

OUTBREAK AT BERLIN.—At Berlin on the 13th June, a collision took place with the burgher guard, arising out of an attempt to disperse some workmen who had gone to the minister to demand work or money. Being refused, the guard attempted to disperse them, and five men were wounded. The news spread like lightning. Barricades were formed, and the people having discovered that the arsenal was left unprotected, at 11 o'clock at night, made an attack upon this building and plundered it of about 2000 stand of arms, and of all the trophies of war which it contained. The crowd kept possession of the building till 10 o'clock and then retired. The next day was quiet, but one of the deputies moved that the Assembly should send away all the troops and put themselves under the protection of the people. This was carried and the Government resigned.

At Prague the King having refused to confirm the Provisional Government, and Prince [somebody] having erected batteries round the town, the mob and the students rose en masse and demanded arms.

A despatch from London, dated June 24, at noon, says: A struggle has commenced in Paris and the National Guards are fighting with the people. There had already been an awful sacrifice of life. Every thing is in great confusion.

PARIS, Friday, 5 P. M.—It is just reported that the executive government have resigned, and Gen. CAVIGNAC has been placed at the head of the armed forces, and has declared Paris in a state of siege. That is the last movement of which we have intelligence, and we can only say that the usual Expresses from Paris for London journals have not arrived. All we can obtain from the best sources is a repetition of the statement that all communication with Paris had been interdicted.

There was an outbreak at Pragne which resulted in the loss of many lives in the city. Barricades were made and the troops were drives out At the last accounts things were more quiet, Horrid Murders in Petersburgh!

From the Troy Commercial Advertiser, Monday.

Noah Smith and his wife, both over 70 years of age, were murdered at Petersburgh on Saturday night. Mr. Smith was a farmer, an old resident of the town—a very quiet, inoffensive man—and was known to have quite a sum of money in his house, generally supposed to be from $1000 to $1500, and that much of it was in specie.

They lived about a mile and a half east of the village of Petersburgh, on the Williamstown road. Mrs. Smith was a sister of the father of the Hon. Gideon Reynolds, present member of Congress from this district. Mr. Smith was a citizen of high character, and enjoyed the confidence and respect of that community. The occurrence produced the most profound sensation and highest excitement in that section of the county; and as the news spread like electricity, thousands assembled yesterday at the scene of the horrid tragedy.

Coroner Defreest of this city, left town yesterday afternoon, and is now engaged in an examination.

No person lodged at the house on the night of the murder, except Mr. and Mrs. Smith. The murdered bodies were found about five o'clock yesterday morning. Mr. Smith was found near his barn, a short distance from the house, with his skull broken in. It is thought that he was called out on some pretence, and despatched.—The body of Mrs. Smith was in the house, with a severe wound upon her head, and her throat cut from ear to ear! From appearances, she was about retiring to rest; and from this fact, it is supposed the murders were committed about nine o'clock in the evening.

It was known to the friends and neighbors of Mr. Smith, that a few days ago he received $800 or $900. No definite suspicion is entertained as to the authors of this horrible crime. Four hundred dollars were found in the house, in thirteen different places, where it is supposed it was placed to prevent the chances of robbery.

The town of Petersburgh was never before the theatre of such a crime; and this fact, together with its dreadful atrocity, and the high and spotless character of the victims, contributed to produce the most intense excitement in the public mind. No effort will be spared by the people to ferret out the murderers.

We are indebted to Mr. Joshua S. Lewis of Grafton, and to Mr. Joel Mallary of this city, for the above particulars. Mr. Lewis had them from a gentleman who was yesterday at Petersburgh.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, July 3, 1848.

SENATE.—Mr. Underwood, of Kentucky, presented the credentials of his newly-appointed colleague, Mr. Metcalf, who went forward, was duly qualified, and took his seat.

After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution from the House in favor of fixing on the 17th inst. as the period for the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, resumed the speech which he had previously commenced.—He said that he should be able to demonstrate that Gen. Cass stands nowhere on the subject of the Wilmot Proviso, and that he has evaded the only real issue on this question. He had left the public wholly in the dark. Mr. M. then went on to make quotations from Gen. Cass's speeches, letters and other documents, to sustain this position.

He was here interrupted, and on leave, interrogated by Mr. Hannegan and Mr. Foote.

Mr. Mangum replied, and then proceeded to speak for upwards of two hours, and stated that two different set of opinions had been produced by the Democrats, one for circulation at the South and the other at the North.

When he had concluded, Mr. Hannegan obtained the floor and made a brief and eloquent reply. He defended Gen. Cass and explained the charges preferred against him, and showed that the apparent discrepancy of his opinions made both before and after his nomination, were reconcilable.

When Mr. Hannegan sat down, Mr. Reverdy Johnson obtained the floor, and produced the third edition of the Life of Geneal Cass.

Mr. Hannegan rejoined, and expressed surprise at the disclosure made by the Senator from Maryland, and disclaimed for every democratic member in the House any participation in the transaction.

Mr. Foote, of Mississippi, followed at length, in defence of General Cass, and in reply to the attack made upon him, his opinions and principles.

When he had sat down. Mr. Niles, of Ct., said this was very much like a ratification meeting, with great decorum to be sure. There were no groans and no hisses. All the speakers had been very successful in assisting opponents and in damaging their own condidates; at least none had been very successful in defending their respective nominees. He supposed the next thing would be resolutions ratifying both nominations, and denominate candidates or the two Generals—Gen. SUCCESS and Gen. AVAILABILITY.

Without taking any question, the Senate adjourned till Wednesday, the 5th of July.

The House assembled at 11 o'clock. The Speaker took his seat and called to order. The Journal was read and approved.

After the transaction of some routine business, Mr. Burt, of South Carolina, moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the farther consideration of the bill in favor of increasing the efficiency of the Army Regiments, and providing for disabled officers, &c., which was carried, and the bill laid on the Speaker's table.

Delivery of Trophies of the Revolution to Vermont.

Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, introduced a joint resolution in favor of delivering two cannon at the Washington Arsenal to the State of Vermont, whose people captured them in the Revolutionary War. The resolution was adopted.

Mr. Vinton of Ohio, moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn over till Wednesday, the 5th inst. He also moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which was agreed to, Mr. Root of Ohio, being called to the Chair, when the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was taken up.

Mr. Flournoy of Virginia, being entitled to the floor, resumed a speech which he had commenced on Saturday, and concluded. When he had sat down, he was followed oy Mr. Woodward, of S. C., in a constitutional argument against the Wilmot Proviso.

When he had sat down. Mr. Preston of Virginia, obtained the floor and replied to Mr. Bailey's recent speeches on territorial rights, and warmly advocated Gen. Taylor's election.

On motion the bill was laid aside and the Post Office bill was taken up, when the Senate's amendment respecting the mail to Havannah was discussed, and then on motion the bill was laid aside and the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. Jones of Tennessee, moved to take up the resolution calling for all the pay received by Gen. Cass for all his sevices.

The motion was objected to, when on motion the House adjourned over till Wednesday, the 5th inst.

DEATH FROM THE BURSTING OF A SODA FOUNTAIN.—Between 3 and 4 o'clock Saturday afternoon, a soda fountain in the manufactory of Asa White, No. 109 Ann street, exploded, instantly killing a young man named Leander Washburn, the foreman of the establishment, and inflicting a bad wound on the heel of another workman named Clifford. The deceased was a man of good habits and character, and a native of Peterboro', N. H. At the time of the explosion, the deceased was standing over the fountain, charging it, when a part of it flew upward, striking him on the lower jaw, which it fractured in three places, dislocating his neck, and bruising his face.—Boston Daily Adv. July 4.

THE U. STATES MEN-OF-WAR.—The Dallas, a sister vessel to the War Steamer Jefferson, made her appearance in Kingston Dock Yard, on Sunday, accompanied by a Merchant Schooner, acting as tender to the men-of-war. Both steamers are now preparing to descend the St. Lawrence towards the ocean, thence to New York, to be turned over to the service of the Coast Guard.—It is probable that they will take their departure today or tomorrow. The two vessels are under the charge of Capt. Frazer, the head of the Revenue Department, at Washington; but the Dallas is commanded by Capt. Ottinger, and the Jefferson by Captain Howard. We need not add that these gentlemen have been the recipients of the attentions and hospitalities of the officers in garrison, both naval and military, because such is ever the custom when officers of a foreign service visit a British port. With these attentions, nevertheless, we have heard the American officers express themselves highly gratified; and yesterday, on board the Jefferson, an opportunity was taken to return the same, by inviting some sixty or seventy ladies and gentlemen to a lunch on board that vessel.—British Whig.

Cayuga Lake.

Cayuga Lake, how lovely yet
Thy waters seem to me;
I've wander'd far, and ne'er have met
A Gem in so much beauty set,
A scene so sweet and free.

Long years ago, when wildness still
Reign'ed o'er this magic view,
Then o'er thy wave with a woodman's skill,
A flashing oar, and joyous will,
I paddled the bark canoe.

The banks were fringed with the elm and pine,
The oak and sycamore;
Whose crowns were wreath'd with many a vine,
Which cast a shade in a waving line,
Beneath the pebbled shore.

The graceful swan in cove and bay,
Flock'd o'er the silver flood;
On poised wings and measur'd way,
The Fisher Hawk in quest of prey,
In mid air hov'ring stood.

The Doe and spotted Fawn were here
To drink the fountain pure;
Or wash their track from the foe in the rear,
And gaz'd at my barque without any fear,
From arm of mine secure.

As Genii in some fairly land
Watch'd o'er the fates of men,
An Eagle on yon jutting strand,
From a leafless tree, on ev'ry hand,
O'erlook'd the lea and glen.

Oh! then this heart of mine was light,
No care was on my brow;
My youthful hopes had never a blight,
The future was bathing a gleam as bright,
As the light upon thee now.

Cayuga Lake, how lovely yet,
Thy waters seem to me;
I've wander'd far, and ne'er have met,
A Gem in so much beauty set,

My Father's Grave.

My father's grave! how sacred is the spot,
Where sleeps the dust of my departed sire;
That hallowed place can never be forgot,
While in this heart shall burn affection's fire.

I love at eve to wander there alone,
When sadness rules each passion in my breast,
And lean myself upon the cold gray stone,
That tells of him who finds beneath a rest.

Then come the visions of my childhood years,
And memory gives to each a native grace;
Thy stately form, departed sire, appears,
With welcome smiles upon thy pallid face.

O could I aught address thy airy shade,
Or hear thy counsel for each path I tread,
How many errors might I thus evade,
And shun the toils that vice around hath spread!

But while I mourn thee with affection due,
And chide the blow that struck thy manhood down,
Still Virtue's path I boldly will pursue,
Nor yield to pleasure's smile or avarice's frown.

I'll plant no flowers above his lowly grave,
That blossom and decay with life so brief,
But let the grass perennial o'er it wave,
A fitter emblem of abiding grief.

Bread upon the Water.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

A lad was toiling up a hill, near the city, under the weight of a heavy basket, on the afternoon of a sultry day in August. He had been sent home with some goods to a customer who lived a short distance in the country.—The boy was lightly built, and his burden almost beyond his strength. Many times he sat down to rest himself on his way up the hill. But it seemed as if he would never reach the summit. Each time he lifted the basket, it felt heavier than before.

The boy was about half way up the hill with his basket; when a gentleman overtook and passed him. He had not gone on many paces, when he stopped, and turning round to the lad, looked at him for a moment or two and then said, kindly—

"That's a heavy load you have, my boy.—Come! Let me help you."

And the gentleman took the basket; and carried it to the top of the hill.

"There. Do you think you can get along now?" said he, with a smile, as he set the basket down. "Or shall I carry it a little farther?"

"Oh no, thank you, sir." returned the boy with a glow of gratitude on his fine young face. "I can carry it now, very well; and I am very much obliged to you."

"You are right welcome, my little man, said the gentleman and passed on.

Twenty years from that time, a care-worn man well advanced in life, sat motionless in an old arm chair, with his eyes fixed intently upon the glowing grate. He was alone, and appeared to be in a state of deep abstraction. In a little, while however, the door of the room opened, and the light form of a young and lovely girl glided in.

"Papa," said a low sweet voice, and a hand was laid gently on the old man's arm.

"Is it you dear?" he returned, with a low sigh.

"Yes, papa," and the young girl leaned against him, and parted with her delicate fingers the thin, gray locks that lay in disorder about his forehead.

"I would like to be alone for this evening Florence," said the old man. "I have a good deal to think about, and expect a person on business."

And he kissed her tenderly; yet sighed as he pressed his lips to hers.

The girl passed from the room as noislessly as she had entered. The old man had been calm before her coming in' but the moment she retired, he became agitated and, and arose, and walked the floor uneasily. He continued to pace to and fro, for nearly half an hour, when he stopped suddenly, and listened.—The street door bell had rung. In a little while a man entered the room.

"Mr. Mason," he said, with slightly perceptible embarrassment.

"Mr. Page," returned the old man, with a feeble, quickly fading smile. "Good morning," and he offered his hand.

The visitor grasped the hand and shook it warmly. But there was no pressure in return.

"Sit down, Mr. Page."

The man took a chair, and Mr. Mason sat down near him.

"You promised an answer to my proposal tonight," said the former after a pause.

"I did," returned the old man; "but am as little prepared to give it as I was yesterday. In fact, I have not found an opportunity to say anything to Florence on the subject."

The countenance of the visitor fell, and something like a frown darkened upon his brow.

There was an embarrassing silence of some minutes. After which the old man called Page, said—

"Mr. Mason, I have made an honorable proposal for your daughter's hand. For weeks you have evaded, and do still evade an answer. This seems so much like trifling, that I begin to feel as if just cause for offence existed."

"None is intended, I do assure you," replied Mr. Mason, with something deprecating in his tone. "But, you must remember, Mr. Page, that you have never sought to win the young girl's affection and that as a consequence, the offer of marriage which you wish me to make to her, will be received with surprise, and, it may be disapproval. I wish to approach her on this subject, with discretion. To be too precipitate, may startle her into instant repugnance to your wishes.

"She loves you, does she not?" inquired Page, with a marked significance of manner.

"A child never loved a parent more tenderly," replied Mr. Mason.

"Give her, then, an undisguised history of your embarrassment. Show her, how your fortunes are trembling on the brink of ruin; and that you have but one hope of relief and safety left. The day she becomes my wife you are removed from all danger. Will you do this?".

The old man did not reply. He was lost in a deep reverie. It is doubtful whether he heard all that the man had said.

"Will you do this?" repeated Page, and with some impatience in his tone.

Mason aroused himself as from a dream, and answered, with great firmness and dignity.

"Mr. Page; the struggle in my mind is over. I am prepared for the worst. I have no idea that Florence will favor your suit; and I will not use a single argument to influence her. In that matter, she must be perfectly free. Approach her as a man and win her if you have the power to do so. It is your only hope."

As if stung by a serpent, Page started from his chair.

"You will repent this, sir," he angrily retorted —"and repent it bitterly. I came to you with honorable proposals for your daughter's hand; you listened to them; gave me encouragement, and promised me an answer to-night. Now you meet me with insult! Sir! You will repent this."

Mr. Mason ventured no reply, but merely bowed in token of his willingness to meet and bear all consequences that might come.

For a long time after his angry visitor had retired, did Mr. Mason cross and recross the floor with measured tread. At last he rung a bell, and directed the servant who came to say to Florence that he wished to see her.

When Florence came, she was surprised to see that her father was strongly agitated.

"Sit down, dear," he said, in a trembling voice, "I have something to say to you that must be no longer concealed."

Florence looked wonderingly into her father's face, while her heart began to sink.

Just then a servant opened the door and ushered in a stranger. He was a tall, fine looking man, just in the prime of life. Florence quickly retired, but not before the visitor had fixed his eyes upon her face, and marked its sweet expression.

"Pardon this intrusion, sir," he said as soon as the young girl had left the room; but facts that I have learned this evening have prompted me to call upon you without a moment's delay. My name is Greer, of the firm of Greer, Miller & Co."

Mr. Mason bowed, and said—

"I know your house very well, and now remember to have met you more than once in business transactions."

"Yes. You have bought one or two bills of goods from us," replied the visitor. Then after a moment's pause he said, in a changed voice—

"Mr. Mason, I learned to-night from a source which leaves me no room to doubt the truth of the statement, that your affairs have become seriously embarrassed. That you are in fact, on the very eve of bankruptcy. Tell me frankly whether this is indeed so. I ask from no idle curiosity, nor from a concealed and sinister motive, but to the end that I may prevent the threatened disaster, if it is in my power to do so."

Mr. Mason was dumb with surprise at so unexpected a declaration. He made two or three efforts to speak, but his lips uttered no sound.

"Confide in me, sir," urged the visitor—"Trust me as you would trust your own brother, and lean upon me, if your strength be indeed failing. Tell me,then, is it as I have said?"

"It is," was all the merchant could utter.

"How much will save you? Mention the sum, and if within the compass of my ability to raise, you shall have it in hand to-morrow. Will twenty thousand dollars relieve you from present embarrassment."

"Fully."

"Then let your anxiety subside, Mr. Mason. That sum you shall have. To-morrow morning I will see you. Good evening."—The visitor arose and was gone before his bewildered auditor had sufficiently recovered his senses to know what to think or say.

In the morning, true to his promise, Mr. Greer called upon Mr. Mason, and tendered a check for ten thousand dollars, with his note of hand at thirty days for the ten thousand more, which was almost the same as the money.

While the check and note lay before him upon the desk, and ere he had offered to touch them, Mr. Mason looked earnestly at the man who had so suddenly taken the character of a disinterested, self-sacrificing friend, and said—

"My dear sir, I cannot understand this.—Are you not laboring under some error?"

"Oh, no. You once did me a service that I am now only seeking to repay. It is my first opportunity, and I embrace it eagerly."

"Did you a service. When?"

"Twenty years ago," replied the man, "I was a poor boy and you a man of wealth One hot day, I was sent a long distance with a heavy basket. While toiling up a hill, with the hot sun upon me, and almost overcome with heat and fatigue, you came along, and not only spoke to me kindly, but took my basket and carried it to the top of the hill. Ah, sir, you did not know how deeply that act of kindness sunk into my heart, and I longed for the opportunity to show to you by some act how grateful I felt. But none came. Often, afterward, did I meet you in the street, and look into your face with pleasure. But you did not remember me. Ever since, I have regarded you with different feelings from those I entertained for others; and there has been no time that I would not have put myself out to serve you. Last night I heard of your embarrassments, and immediately called upon you. The rest you know."

Mr. Mason was astonished at so strange a declaration.

"Do you remember the fact to which I allude?" asked Mr. Greer.

"It had faded from my external memory entirely; but your words have brought back a dim recollection of the fact. But it was a little matter, sir, a very little matter, and not entitled to the importance that you have given it."

"To me it was not a little matter, sir," returned Mr. Greer. "I was a weak boy, just sinking under a burden that was too heavy, when you put forth your hand and carried it for me. I could not forget it. And now let me return the favor, at the first opportunity, by carrying your burden for you, which has become too heavy, until the hill is ascended, and you are able to bear it onward again in your own strength."

Mr. Mason was deeply moved. Words failed to express his true feelings. The bread cast upon the water, had returned to him after many days, and he gathered it with wonder and thankfulness.

The merchant was saved from ruin. Nor was this all. The glimpse which Mr Greer received of the lovely daughter of Mr. Mason, revealed a character of beauty that impressed him deeply, and he embraced the first opportunity to make her acquaintance. A year afterward he led her to the altar.

A kind act is never lost, even though done to a child.

SPEED OF SPEECH.—Some reporters say that Daniel Webster speaks at the rate of from 80 to 110 words per minute; Gerrit Smith, from 70 to 90; Dr. Tyng, from 120 to 140; Mr. Botts, from 100 to 120; Mr. Clay, from 130 to 160; Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Choate, from 160 to 200.

Literature of Mexico.

Correspondence of the Boston Atlas.

Mexico, May, 1848.

My Dear S.:—Perhaps you may expect that in the course of these letters, I should say something in regard to the literature of Mexico. It must necessarily stand very much in relation to that of Spain as our own does to that of Great Britain.—The works of the dramatists, poets, romancers and historians of the mother country, are to be found in almost any number, and are familiar to the more intellectual portions of the population, of both sexes. The writings of all French authors of celebrity may be had in most of the private, and in many of the public libraries of the city. The ancient classics, too, are on their shelves, or in the cloisters. The military library, at Chapultepec, I well remember, (for I was half a day in ransacking it,) contained many volumes of each of the classes I have mentioned. I have also repeatedly met them in the different convents of the city. Indeed, it is no uncommon thing to hear an accomplished Spaniard or Mexican—whether lady or gentleman—quoting the ancient or modern classics. With regard to the literature of Great Britain and the United States, the mass of the people are of course profoundly ignorant If they can read the Mexican newspapers, or the "Pronunciamentos" posted up at the corners of the streets, they are fortunate. Some few of the more educated can read Prescott in the original, while there are thousands in the capital alone, who understand and appreciate him in the Spanish translation. The same may be said in relation to many of the English classics, and some of our own novels, which I have seen in several libraries, in a Spanish dress. I think I have before mentioned Young and Blair among the English writers. The immortal works of Cervantes and Le Sage are to be found in the library of every intelligent citizen, and I have seen pulque shops with signs bearing the names of Sancho Panza and Gil Blas.

But Mexico cannot be said to have a national literature of her own. I do not mean that there are not accomplished scholars within her borders, who can write an able treatise upon some passing political occurrence—or furnish poetry for the columns of a newspaper or annual. But I mean that Mexico has never yet, so far as my knowledge extends, produced any great national work, either in poetry, history, philosophy or science, which places her at once upon a high and proud position. I have recently seen the sheets of a History of Mexico, by a native author, which has been long in preparation; but it is dangerous for any one, either in Mexico or out of it, to attempt to chronicle the events of the conquest, with the work of our own accomplished countryman before him. A history of the war between Mexico and the United States is announced. Its impartiality is vouched for by those who have seen portions of it, but one can judge better on that important point when he has given the volume a perusal. At any rate, the author will be fortunate indeed, if it rise to the rank of a standard work.

The Mexican annuals, which I have seen are edited with taste and abilty. The poetry is generally of a passionate and voluptuous character, as you might suppose it would be, under the influences of a tropical clime. From the sale of several of these, the number of admirers of light literature must be very considerable.

The periodical literature is more than respectable in character. Since the nation has been in a state of war, no literary magazines have been published. Indeed, the condition of the Republic in this respect presented a great obstacle to the cultivation of belles lettres. It has not, however, always been so. I have seen bound volumes of different periodicals, running through a long series of years, devoted to the discussion of literary topics, and to poetical contributions. The daily papers are conducted with much ability, and a large space in them is occupied with original or select sketches, as in the French journals, under the title of "Boletin." One of them, the Monitor, the leading paper in the Republic has published, thus far, nearly half of the "Count of Monte Christo," by Dumas—though I imagine the editor, before he concludes the work, will find some passages in it that will not prove entirely acceptable to his readers. Indeed, complaints have already been made of the publication. A column or two in each journal is devoted to poetry, but a large portion of the dailies is necessarily given up to political matters. The Monitor has also recently published in its columns an entire treatise on Mexican Cookery!

One of the pages of this influential journal will hereafter be published in English, and the old Siglo XIX, edited by Otero—one of the Senators who voted against the Treaty—will soon be revived—a page of it, also, published in English. These things show the effect of the occupation of the country by the Americans upon its periodical literature.

Pulpit literature ought to form an interesting feature in the literary history of the country. I am not able to speak with confidence in relation to its quality or character. One meets with a good many occasional sermons in print, remarkable rather for their sectarian devotion than for any literary excellence. And yet there are some highly educated and most accomplished men among the clergy of Mexico. The Archbishop of Mexico and Cesarea is distinguished for his learning and his eloquence. His letter to General Scott, asking the release of certain Mexican prisoners, is a finely conceived and eloquent production.

Many of the bishops might also be named, who are men of a high order of intellect, and thoroughly versed in ancient and in much of the modern literature of Europe. The monks and friars are a different order of beings. Their reading is altogether of a theological character. They delve into the musty tomes of the Fathers, and reproduce whole volumes of them in the Spanish language. You may go into any convent in the city, and you will find its library—generally very large—filled with little more than the Latin works—each in more volumes than one would suppose could emanate from a single brain—of the monks of the middle ages. Among them you will discover large piles of manuscripts—either translations or original disquisitions upon some favorite theological doctrine. You will generally find in these libraries also most of the Latin classics.

As might be supposed, in a country where there is so much political agitation, the number of political tracts which issue from the press is by no means small. These are frequently written by some of the most distinguished statesmen of the republic, and often printed in a style that challenges admiration. Indeed, much of its best talent, which might be given to literature, is devoted to the discussion of political topics. But Mexico is not a solitary instance of this. It is emphatically true of the United States, where so much of the intellect of the country wears the political garb.

Mexico possesses all the elements of a national literature. Her scenery is magnificent, almost beyond conception. The wild and the beautiful, the grand and sublime, cannot be without their influences upon her people. She possesses, also, many intellectual spirits, who, catching inspiration from these influences, might, by their literary efforts, immortalize themselves and their country. I have often thought that the poet or romancer could desire no better theme for his pen, than that suggested by the relation which has so long existed between the two races inhabiting the country. The conquerors and the conquered live upon the same soil, in daily intercourse with each other. It is true, Mexico achieved her independence, and threw off the Spanish yoke. But the Spaniards still remain, and are the superior race. They are haughty and proud, presenting in this, as in many other points, a strong contrast to the descendants of the Aztecs. The hostility existing between them can probably never be eradicated. Look, for instance, at the rising of the Indians against the whites in Yucatan. Ancient grievances, growing out of the conquest of the country, are at the bottom of all this hostility. The offence is of no recent standing. Indeed, there is much the same contrast between the two races in Mexico as existed between the Saxons and Normans in England, from the study of whose history and manners at that early period, Walter Scott gave us that wonderful literary achievement, Ivanhoe.

I believe several of our own countrymen have attempted the illustration of Mexican life and manners in the form of the novel. I remember only "Calavar," a Tale of the Conquest, by Dr. Bird, and "Francis Berrien," by the late Timothy Flint. The first I never happened to read. The latter is remarkable more for the beauty of its style and its graphic descriptions of scenery, than for the naturalness and truthfulness of impersonations or portraitures of character. It is a modern tale, and nearly as full of improbabilities and hair-breadth escapes, as a ghost story by Monk Lewis, or Mrs. Kadcliffe. The conquest of Mexico affords a fine field for the exercise of the romancer's pen, and as there are many educated and intellectual men in the army, who have had the benefit of seeing Mexico as it is—ay, and in many respects, as it was centuries ago—it is hoped that some of them will hereafter embody the result of their observations and reflections, in the form of a poem or a romance.

MEXICAN INDIANS AND THE AMERICANS.—On the departure of our army from Mexico, the Indians—who constitute nearly the whole laboring population—exhibited their sorrow in the most striking and affecting manner. The sojourn of our army in Mexico has relieved these poor and interesting people of many oppressions and taxes to which they have long been subjected. They are the producers and industrials of the country, and hitherto have contributed, thro' the Alcabala, and other taxes, to support the extravagant Government of Mexico. Intercourse with our soldiers—a knowledge of the kindly dispositions, as well as of the brave hearts and strong arms of our countrymen—have inspired the descendants of Montezuma with a profound respect and warm affection for the American people.—There is one single trait of our countrymen which has aroused the liveliest admiration of the poor Indians. It is their behavior to females.

The lower class of the Mexicans treat their women harshly. As for the poor Indians, of both sexes, the Mexicans treat them like dogs. When they contrasted the kind and polite consideration of our soldiers toward their women with the brutal conduct of the Mexicans—when they saw an American soldier turning out of the way to let a Mexican woman pass—they could scarcely understand, much less express their gratitude for, such unexpected kindness. As our army passed out of their towns, crowds of these poor people surrounded our troops and threw bouquets and fruit to the soldiers, and many of them wept piteously, crying out that they had lost their only friends.

This feeling will inevitably arouse the Indians, who compose six-eighths of the population of Mexico, to resistance and rebellion against the authorities of that country. These effects have been manifested throughout the country. The power of the whites can no more resist the overwhelming force of the Indians than a dry reed could stand against a tornado. They will be driven to the seashore—ay, into the sea, and compelled to leave the country. Foreign assistance alone can save Mexico from relapsing into the hands of the aborigines.

Demonstration of Louis Napoleon.

The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Herald says:

Prince Napoleon is exciting an immense sensation throughout France. I have just returned from Fontainbleau, and passengers upon the railroads and steamboats were engrossed in discussing the passing events of the last three days. They seem to regard it now as certain that he will be a most prominent candidate for the Presidency, and probably a successful one. The common people are full of Napoleon, and they can almost see Napoleon himself, with his cocked hat and gray surtout, again re-uscitating the mighty power of France, and dictating laws to Europe. No one can fully realize how strong this national sentiment is towards Napoleon, without mingling with the French people. Indeed, the man is living all around them. He lives in paintings, statuary, and monuments—in every man's resting place; and the glory of his deeds is written upon the walls of all the huts, as well as palaces, in France. Wherever you go, the traveller meets Napoleon. Napoleon really accomplished more in the ten years of his immortal reign in France—more that will be enduring, and is worthy to be commemorated—than all the Bourbons that have sat upon the throne. This the plain common sense of the people understand, and all the old men of the nation, or nearly so, have made with him the tour of Europe, and been eye witnesses to the magnitude of his foreign conquests. They want a republic, but they want a great man at the head of it; and they feel that it is better to have the descendant of a great man, who bears the name of Napoleon, if they cannot have a new name which will give new glory to France.

The correspondent of the Tribune says of LOUIS NAPOLEON:

Four departments have chosen him as National Representative, and after two days of parliamentary debates and street riots, their choice has been confirmed by the National Assembly. Today he is to take his place as a member of that body, and since a noisy demonstration is again expected on this occasion, the troops are marching, the drums are rolling the orderlies spring hither and thither, and the blousemen and gamins swarm together. At every street corner his picture is sold to crowds of buyers, and the cry "Vive Napoleon!" is every where heard.—Four new Bonapartist journals have already been established: le Napoleonien, le Napoleon Republicain, la Constitution de la Republique Napoleonienne and le Petit Caporal. Pamphlets and loose sheets, which make a great man of him, are rather given away than bought—old officers of the Imperial Army talk glory to the groups—the laborers are told, that the Prince possesses two thousand millions francs in property; which he will immediately place at the disposition of France, and make everybody rich at once—the Army, which finally feels a desire to play some other part than to be quietly shot down in Algiers by the Bedouins, or in Paris by the men of the barricades, greets him with enthusiasm as a glorious remembrance and a brilliant hope—the Bourgeoisie, who, before all things, wish to have quiet and order, and who remember, with pleasure, the masterly order which prevailed under the iron hand of the Emperor, are not precisely discontented; and thus all—citizens, soldiers, workmen, students, blouse men and gamins—shout "Vive l' Empereur!"

Under these auspices Louis Napoleon appears on the stage. Surrounded by experienced counselors and skilful agents, richer than the Republic, which is now very poor, he has an easy play, in opposition to a weak, incapable Government, and an exhausted, divided National Assembly; and should it remain the determination of the Committee who draft the Constitution, that the future President shall be chosen by the universal suffrage of all the citizens of France. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte will be first elected—and after he has been President three years, it will be but a short step to an Emperor. Thus matters stand at present—not very consolatory, but what is to be done! We have trembled forty-three years under a Monarchy—the whole generation has grown up in monarchical ideas—there is a visible lack of Republicans, and without Republicans no genuine Republic can be founded.

Dr. Roe's "Manipulator."—Last Winter, we announced the invention of this telegraphic machine; and promised a future description of its structure and operation. Dr. R. is now in the city, for the purpose of exhibiting his improvement, for which he has received a patent, and we now redeem our promise.

All of the Magnetic telegraphs in use depend for their operation upon the simple connecting, continuing and breaking of the galvanic circuit. In all, the operation consists in alternately separating and connecting, by contact, the conducting wire. In Morse's, and most other telegraphs, this is done by raising and depressing by the hand, a small lever, to which the end of the wire is attached. This Manipulating is the operation to be performed by the new invention; and is effected by passing one of the separated ends of the conducting wire rapidly over the surface of types, each one of which is successively made the point of junction between the two portions of separate wire. The types on their surfaces correspond with the characters used by the particular telegraph which they are intended to operate. They are set up from the case, as other types are, from the "copy" in the hands of the compositor. This can be done while other telegraph stations are using the wire. This matter is locked up, and the form placed upon the machine. A few turns of the crank pass the conducting point rapidly over the types, and Presto! the dispatch has been telegraphed to a distant city.

The Manipulator is remarkably simple in construction, and somewhat resembles a printing press A metalic bar extends across the machine, six inches above the types, on which plays the "Traverser." This is a tube or cylinder, perforated at the upper end, to enable it to slide across the types, upon the bar, which passes through it. The traverser contains the "wand," made of any non-conducting substance, and terminating at the lower end. in two inclined planes, meeting at an obtuse angle, to enable the types to glide easily under the wand. Immediately at the angle, where these planes meet, the point of the conducting wire comes to the surface from within the wand, and is impelled against the types by a spring within the tube. The other end of the wire connects with the types.

The operation of the machine is this: by a hand upon the crank, the type-bed is made to move in its frame, and one long line of types passes under the point of the wand; closing the galvanic current, when the point touches a type, continuing it according to the length of its surface, and breaking the connection while passing from type to type. When a line of types has passed, a brake falls into a tooth of a rachet-wheel, which causes the traverser and its wand to slide upon the bar a slight distance, and the next line of types passes the point of the wand, by a reverse motion of the crank. This alternate motion is continued until each line has passed once under the wand.

We are assured by the inventor that his model, although very imperfect, will transmit about fifteen hundred of Morse's signs per minute.—Cincinnati Chronicle.

The Beautiful Legend.—We find in a late sermon of Theodore Parker, the following story. The subject of the discourse is "rest:"

"They tell a story that one day Rabbi Judah and his brethren, the seven pillars of wisdom, sat in the Court of the Temple on feast day disputing about rest. One said that it was to have attained sufficient wealth, yet without sin. The second, that it was fame and praise of all men. The third, that it was the possession of power to rule the state. The fourth, that it consisted only of a happy home. The fifth, that it must only be in the old age of one who is rich, powerful, famous, surrounded by children and children's children. The sixth said that all were vain unless a man keep all the ritual law of Moses. And Rabbi Judah, the venerable, the tallest of the brothers, said—'Ye have spoken wisely, but one thing more is necessary, he can only find rest, who to all these things addeth this—that he keepeth the tradition of the elders.'

"There sat in the Court a fair haired boy, playing with lilies in his lap, and hearing the talk, dropped them in astonishment from his hands, and looked up—that boy of twelve—and said—'Nay, nay, fathers, he only loveth rest, who loves his brother as himself, and God with his whole heart and soul. He is greater than fame, and wealth, and power, happier than a happy home, happy without it, better than honored age, he is a law to himself and above all tradition.' The doctors were astonished. They said—'when Christ cometh, shall he tell us greater things?' And they thanked God, for they said—'the old men are not always wise, yet God be praised that out of the mouth of this young suckling, has His praise become perfect.'"

A Gem Passage.—In a letter written in 1838, Lamartine thus beautifully and religiously explains his motives for entering political life:

When the Divine Judge shall summon us to appear before our conscience at the end of our brief journey here below, our modesty, our weakness will not be an excuse for our inaction. It will be of no avail to reply, we were nothing, we could do nothing, we were but as a grain of sand. He will say to us, I placed before you, in your day, the two scales of a beam, by which the destiny of the human race was weighed; in the one was good, and the other evil. You were but a grain of sand, no doubt, but who told you that that grain of sand would not have caused the balance to incline on my side? You have intelligence to see, a conscience to decide, and you should have placed this grain of sand in one or the other; you did neither. Let the wind drift it away; it has not been of any use to you or your brethren.

Sneezing.—An amusing account of the ceremonies which attend the sneezing of a king of Monomotapa shows what a national thing may be the sneeze of despotism. Those who are near his person when this happens, salute him in so loud a tone, that persons in the ante-chamber hear it, and join in the acclamation. In the adjoining apartments they do the same, till the noise reaches the street, and becomes propagated throughout the city. When the king of Sennaar sneezes, his courtiers immediately turn their backs on him, and give a loud slap on their right thigh.

Day by day the accounts of the harvest are still more gratifying, and we have the fairest prospects of very abundant crops. New potatoes, excellent in quality, are coming into market, although their consumption at present is confined to the wealthier classes.

From an abstract of returns from the clerks of the crown and clerks of the peace of the several counties, &c., in Ireland, the number of persons committed to the different jails in the year 1847, we learn is the following:—Committed, 31,683; convicted, 15,276; acquitted by jury, 6,639; no bill, 4,892; discharged from want of prosecution, 4,075; bailed, not tried, insane, or remaining for trial, 802. FRANCE.

The Constitution was presented on the 19th of June. Is was read to the National Assembly by Mr. Armand Marrast, the reporter of the Special Committeee appointed to draw it up, and excited the deepest interest, being listened to with a religious silence.

The following summary of its chief features, we copy from Galignani's Messenger:

It consists of one hundred and thirty-nine articles, and the following are the principal points set forth in them:

The legislative power is to consist of one National Assembly, composed of 750 representatives, elected for three years by universal suffrage.—The head of the republic is to be a President, nominated for four years by universal suffrage; any person can be elected who has attained the age of 30 years, and is a French citizen. The President cannot be re-elected, unless four years have elaped from having before held the chief office in the republic; the President to be lodged at the expense of the republic, with a salary of 600,000 francs a year. A Vice President is to be named by the National Assembly, also for four years, out of a list presented by the President; he is to replace the President when absent; should the Presidentship become vacant by decease, resignation, or any other cause, the Vice President does not then take his place, but a new election is proceeded to within a period of one month. A Council of State, consisting of at least forty members, is to be elected by ballot for three years by the National Assembly, in the first month of each legislature; should any members of the Assembly be chosen. a new election shall be immediately proceeded to, to supply their place as representatives of the people; the Council of State is to draw up such bills as the government may think fit to submit to the Assembly; and to examine such bills as emanate from the Assembly itself; it is also to exercise full control over the departmental and municipal administrations—all courts of justice are to be open, and the jury system is to be extended to certain correctional and civil matters, to be determined by law; the judges of premiere instance and of appeal are nominated by the President of the Republic, and the juages of the Court of Cassation by the National Assembly, and all for life; a high court of justice is to be appointed for the purpose of judging without appeal all accusations made by the National Assembly, either against one of its own members, or against the ministers, or against the President.

Also all persons accused of plots or treason against the State are to be tried by this high tribunal—the practice of having substitutes in the army is interdicted—the punishment of death is abolished for political offences—slavery is abolished in all the French colonies—the press is free, and every man has a right to print or cause to be printed whatever he pleases, subject to such guarantees to the State as may be deemed necessary—the censorship is for ever abolished—all religions are are allowed in France, and the various ministers of the religions recognized by the State are to be paid—public instruction is to be free, but subject to the superintendence of the State.—The national debt is guaranteed—property is inviolable—gratuitous education is to be given to the working classes, so as to prepare them for their different callings—labor is to be essentially guaranteed by equality of relations between the workmen and the employers by the establishment of great public works. Algeria and the colonies are French territory, and to be governed by special laws—the Legion of Honor is to be maintained.

The Constitution guarantees to all citizens—

Liberty—Equality—Security—Instruction—Labor—Property—Assistance.

Liberty consists of the rights of going and coming; of meeting peaceably and without arms; of exercising one's religion; of manifesting his thoughts and opinions by means of the press or otherwise. The exercise of these rights has no other limits than the rights and liberties of other nations, and the public security.

Equality consists in the exclusion of every title and privilege of birth, class, or caste, in the admissibility of every one to all public employments, without any other motive or ground for preference but virtue and talent, and the equitable participation of all citizens in the charges and advantages of society.

Security consists in the inviolability of the person, the family, the domicil, and the rights and property of each and every member of society.

The right of instruction is that which all citizens have to receive gratuitously from the state, the education proper for the development of the physical, moral, and intellectual faculties of each of them.

The right of labor is that which every man has to live by his work. Society must, by the productive and general means of which it disposes, and which will be organized hereafter, furnish labor to all men in health, who cannot procure it otherwise.

Property consists in the right of enjoying and disposing of one's goods and revenues, of the fruits of his intelligence, and of his industry.

The right of assistance is that which belongs to children abandoned, to the infirm, to the old, to receive from the state the means of existing.

AUSTRIA.

The Revolution at Prague.—The Leipsic Gazette, of the 15th, says that intelligence was received at Leipsic of riots at Prague on the previous day, in consequence of Prince Windischgratz, the commander of the troops, refusing to give cannon and ammunition to the students. It appears that the Czech party had got up a demonstration on the 12th, and that crowds had assembled in consequence to listen to some inflammatory speeches from the leaders of the party. The result was as intended. The people, becoming excited, about midday assembled before the house of the commandant to give him a charivari. A body of grenadiers who were concealed within the place came forth; and the crowd having been uselessly summoned to disperse, blows ensued, which led ultimately to a general fight, and the raising barricades on the part of the people. The commandant, Prince Windischgratz, caused the alarm to be beaten, and gave till four o'clock to the people to take down the barricades. The tumult, however, increased every minute, and fresh barricades were made. A mass of People attacked the house of Prince Windischgratz, and the Princess herself was wounded in the head. The Prince ordered heavy guns to be brought out, and a strong cannonade took place, which lasted from five till ten in the afternoon.

Heroism of Prince Windischgratz.—The Warsaw Zeitung gives the following interesting details: "Owing to the refusal of the Prince to give arms to the people on the 10th, the Swornost faction proceeded in large numbers to the residence of the Commander-in-Chief, where they sang songs insulting to the Prince, accompanied by hootings and threats. The military on duty having in vain called upon the mob to be orderly and disperse, and the fatal shot being fired at this moment which deprived the unfortunate Princess of her life, the Prince, with great dignity and calmness, advanced into the midst of them, and addressed them to the following effect:

"'Gentlemen: If it is your desire to insult me because I am of noble birth, go to my palace and do there as you may think fit. I will even give you a guard that you may not be disturbed in your amusement. But if you act thus because I am commander of Prague, and purpose making a demonstration in front of this building, I tell you candidly that I shall prevent such a step with every means at my command. My wife now lies a lifeless corpse above stairs, and yet I address you in words of kindness. Gentlemen, do not drive me to severe measures.'"

After this noble speech, under circumstances of so heart-rending a nature, the Prince, instead of being hearkened to, was roughly seized upon by two Czechs, and dragged to the next lamp-post, where a rope was soon provided—at this moment the Prince's grenadiers advanced with fixed bayonets, and in less than a second cleared the square and delivered the Prince. Five minutes afterward the artillery swept the streets.

Prince Windischgratz is spoken of as one of the most distinguished generals in the Austrian service, a perfect soldier, of great energy, and a will as firm as iron. The Bohemians fear and respect him, and call him "Prince Herod"—his men are blindly devoted to him.

The Princess Windischgratz was the daughter of Field-Marshal Prince Schwarzenberg, and her mother is the lady who perished in the flames while endeavoring to save her child, at the conflagration of the Festive Hall erected as a ball room to celebrate the marriage of Napoleon with Maria Louisa of Austria, an occurrence which at the time caused an immense sensation.

Bombardment of the City.—The Leipsic Gazette says: "On the 13th, at midday, the military had completely the upper hand, and Prince Windischgratz determined to restore the communication between the old and new town. For this purpose he caused the chain bridges over the Moldau, which had been broken, to be repaired, and the barricades on the lesser side to be taken by storm. In this affair several of the troops were killed, being shot from the neighboring windows. The fighting here lasted until six o'clock in the afternoon, when the Czech party demanded a parley, and hopes were held out that the students and the people would lay down their arms. The Czechs, however, required that Prince Windischgratz and the military should leave the city, consequently every idea of accommodation was abandoned. The rumor was spread on the night of the 13th that there would be a general attack on all the German inhabitants of the town. Great fright was caused by this, and whole families might be seen flying through the gates out of the city, leaving their all behind. After the breaking off the parley the people retired to Podskal, where they concentrated themselves, and where the jagers and hussars followed them, to attack them. There a terrible slaughter ensued on both sides; twenty-six hussars were thrown into the Moldau by the people, and the battle lasted until the 14th June, at half-past nine. On that day General Count Mensdorff arrived from Vienna, in order to assume the command-in-chief, in the hope that as the Bohemians seem to have taken a vehement dislike to Prince Windischgratz, the assumption of command by Mensdorff might restore peace.—This was, however, a vaint hope; the tumult increased every moment, the fight was renewed, and the Czech party obtained possession of the town. Prince Windischgratz then abandoned the town with the military, and retired to the heights round the city, thence to bombard the town.—Such was the state of affairs on the morning of the 16th, to which date our accounts reach.—Count Leo Thun had been obliged to fly in the disguise of a servant."

Horrible Slaughter and Cruelty.—A letter from Vienna of the 17th says: The news from Prague is melancholy in the extreme: To-day we hear the insurgents continued to hold out with unflinching obstinacy. Prince Windischgratz had commenced bombarding the town, all the inhabitants willing to leave Prague having been allowed to withdraw. The details received concerning the insurrection are appalling: the most hideous acts of atrocity have been committed. Murder and pillage reigned in the city, and the German inhabitants, who at the risk of their lives had escaped into the country, were robbed by the bands of marauders infesting the neighborhood.

Another account says: "The scenes of horror are frightful in the extreme. A stationer of the name of William Weiss, who, in the capacity of National Guard, had slain two students, was crucified on his own door, and his house demolished.—If Prince Windischgratz had been captured it was resolved to cut off his head and stick it on the highest pinnacle of the tower of the Town Hall.—The Prince, with a very polite message, sent an escort of cavalry to accompany the members of the Sclavonic Diet in safety to the gates of Prague."

Vienna, June 18.—Intelligence from Prague is of a more quiet character. The city has capitulated. The rebels have given fourteen hostages; and Prince Windischgratz, who has again undertaken the supreme command, has occupied it with his troops.

Lord Brougham in Luck's Way.—Mr. Watt, jr., of Birmingham, recently deceased, has bequeathed to Lord Brougham £50,000. The £25,000 left some time ago to his lordship by Mrs. Flaherty, of Hammersmith, he generously gave to his brother, Mr. W. Brougham.

When the old soldiers of the Imperial army, at the Hotel des Invalides, heard last week that the National Assembly had voted for the admission of Prince Louis Napoleon, they, under the influence of enthusiasm inspired by the name of their former Emperor, fired four of the cannon mounted on the esplanade of the Invalides.

Fair Margaret—A Legend of Thomas the Rhymer.

BY WILLIAM H. C. HOSMER.

Old yews in the church yard are crumbled to dust,
Deep shade on the grave-mound once flinging;
But oral tradition, still true to its trust,
Her name by the hearth-stone is singing:
For never enshrined by the bard in his lay
Was a being more lovely than Margaret Gary.

Her father, a faithful old tenant, had died
On lands of Sir Thomas the Seer—
And the child who had sprung like a flower by his side,
Sole mourner, had followed his bier;
But Ercildoun's knight to the orphan was kind,
And watched like a parent the growth of her mind.

The wizard knew well that her eye was endowed
With sight mortal vision surpassing—
Now piercing the heart of Oblivion's cloud,
The Past, in its depths, clearly glassing;
Anon sending glance through the curtain of dread
Behind which the realm of the Future lies spread.

He gave her a key to decipher dim scrolls,
With characters wild, scribbled over;
And taught her dark words that would summon back souls
Of the dead round the living to hover;
Or oped, high discourse with his pupils to hold,
Old books of enchantment with clasps of bright gold.

The elf queen had met her in green, haunted dells
When stars in the zenith are twinkling,
And time kept the tramp of her palfry to bells,
At her bridle rein merrily tinkling:
By Huntley Burn oft, in the gloaming, she strolled
Weird shapes, that were not of this earth, to behold.

One eve came true Thomas to Margaret's bower,
In this wise the maiden addressing—
"No more will I visible be from this hour,
Save to those sight unearthly possessing:
But when I am seen at feast, funeral or fair
Let the mortal who makes revelation beware!"

Long years came and passed, and the Rhymer's dread seat
Was vacant the Eildon Tree under,
And oft would old friends by the ingle-side meet,
And talk of his absence in wonder:
Some thought that afar from the dwellings of men,
He had died in some lone Highland forest or glen:

But others believed that in bright fairy land
The mighty magician was living—
That newness of life to worn heart and weak hand,
Soft winds and pure waters were giving;
That back to the region of heather and pine
Would he come unimpaired by old age or decline.

Astir was all Scotland! from mountain and moor,
With banner folds streaming in air,
Proud lord and retainer, the wealthy and poor,
Thronged forth in their plaids to the fair;
Steeds, pricked by their riders, loud clattering made,
And, cheered by his clansmen, the bag-piper played.

Gay lasses with snoods from the border and hills
In holiday garb hurried thither,
With eyes like the crystal of rock-shaded rills,
And cheeks like the belles of the heather:
But fairest of all, in that goodly array,
Was the Lily of Bemerside, Margaret Gray.

While Ayr with a gathering host overflowed,
She marked with a look of delight
A white-bearded horseman who gallantly rode
On a mettlesome steed black as night,
And cried, forcing wildly her way through the throng,
"Oh! master thy pupil hath mourned for thee long?"

Then, checking his courser, the brow of the seer
Grew dark, through his locks long and frosted,
And making a sign with his hand to draw near,
Thus the lovely offender accosted—
"By which of thine eyes was thy master descried?"
"With my left I beheld thee!" the damsel replied.

One moment he gazed on the beautiful face,
In fondness upturned to his own,
As if anger at length to relenting gave place,
Then fixed grew his visage like stone:—
On the violet lid his cold finger he laid,
And extinguished forever the sight of the maid.

NOTE. I am indebted to Hugh Cameron, Esquire, of Ruffelo N. Y. for this strange and strikingly beautiful legend. Mr. C. informs me that it has long formed a part of the fire side lore of his own clan, and from a remote period, has lived in the memory of Scotland's peasantry. He expressed surprise that men of antiquarian taste, in compiling border ballads, and tales of enchantment, had not given "Fair Margaret" a conspicuous place in their pages; and at his suggestion I have attempted to clothe the fanciful outlines of the original in the drapery of English verse.

The Eildon tree referred to in the poem, was the favorite seat of Thomas the Rhymer, and there he gave utterance to his prophecies.

Michigan Correspondence.

JACKSON, July 4th, 1848.

MR. EDITOR:—This is the strangest anniversary of our nation's birthday, that I ever saw. No one in our usually noisy village had his or her slumbers disturbed this morning, by a National salute, for "the Fourth of July don't come through here," as a little boy said a few days since, and the cannons have all gone where they do have a Fourth of July. There was no ringing of bells at sunrise, but at 7 o'clock the Brick Church bell tolled for the death of a man one hundred years old, who this Independence day has exchanged worlds. The tones of that death-knell sounded strangely solemn; and the thought arose, will the funeral knell of our nation, now so prosperous and happy, ever fall on human ear till it be declared that "time shall be no longer." Who can tell? Who would wish to look into the future and read such a revelation as this?

July, 5th.—To-day attended the funeral of the aged man who died yesterday. It was a strange spectacle to me to see his gray-headed sons and daughters standing around the coffin of their father, with grand children almost arrived at life's meridian, and great-grand children whom but a few short years more will place on the stage of active life.

How few attain to the age of an hundred years—A whole century! And how undesirable it must be to outlive the days of active usefulness.—When a person becomes unfitted to benefit his fellow beings, how much better to pass to a habitation of rest. The deceased felt this, and though all was done, that filial affection could do for his happiness, he thought that "to be with Christ," were far better.

July 6th. Last evening heard the particulars concerning the Celebration at Spring Arbor and Tecumseh. Spring-Arbor, as you know, is a small place, yet, notwithstanding the rain, there was an audience of about 500, who listened to an oration delivered by Mr. H. Frink, of this place, in a grove a short distance from the village. A dinner was served up in a bower near the hotel and no one could complain that it was a "dry affair," for about that time, the rain came down in torrents. Not one, when the cloth was removed, felt disposed to sing "I'd be a butterfly" &c.

At Tecumseh the large assemblage were compelled by the rain, to adjourn from a bower that had been prepared, to the Presbyterian church, which could not half hold the audience. After the reading of the Declaration of Independence, and an eloquent oration, the latter by the Rev. G. L. FOSTER of this place, and other appropriate exercises, the procession formed and marched to a large ware-room, where a bountiful collation was in readiness. Five hundred "Sons of Temperance" and about one hundred and sixty ladies partook of the refreshments.

A gentleman who was present, when he was asked the next day what sort of a time they had at Tecumseh; "Oh" said he "we had a most enthusiastic time, and just water enough for the Sons."

Some of the farmers are in the midst of their wheat harvesting; others have not yet commenced In both cases fears are entertained that the grain will be injured. How few there are, either in the country or in the city, who will lay aside all anxiety about these perishable things, and adopt, in heart and life, the beautiful language of the prophet, "although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flocks shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stall; yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation."

Surely the faith of the present generation in the goodness of their Creator is not as a grain of mustard seed."

E. MARIA SHELDON.

CAUTION TO MERCHANTS.—Whe heard a good story of a sagacious country gentleman, who came to our city some days ago, with a bill on a highly respectable firm of this city. The bill was duly presented for acceptance, and a young member of the firm, a fashionable, showily dressed gentleman, who had cultivated a very dainty moustache, wrote with a gold pen, his endorsement on the bill, giving his middle name as J. Templeton Tompkins. The countryman looked at the signature, read it slowly, glanced at the fashionable merchant, who was very fascinatingly twirling his whiskers, and handing the bill over to him, remarked, "Here stranger, cash that document."

"What!" indignantly replied the merchant, "discount my own paper! it is a positive insult."

"Wall, can't help it," said the countryman, "if you don't I must get somebody else to do it."

To prevent his paper from getting on 'Change' the merchant concluded to cash the bill, and paying over the money to the countryman, asked quietly, "Why, my friend, do you offer me the gratuitous insult of requiring me to discount my own paper?"

"I don't mean any harm, stranger, but I have jest got this idea into my skull, that when you see a merchant with that har on his upper lip, and who writes his middle name out in full, and endorses bills with a gold pen, you may set it down as purty certain he's gwine to bust up in a week."

The Late Massacre in Oregon.

The Missionary Herald for the present month contains the particulars of the late massacre in Oregon, as communicated by Mr. Spalding, one of the surviving missionaries of the Am. Board in that Territory. The Board had four stations in Oregon, viz. at Waiilatpu, (where the massacre took place,) under the superintendence of Dr. Whitman,—at Clear Water among Nez Perces, under the charge of Mr. Spalding, mentioned above,—at Tshimakain among the Flat Heads, under charge of Messrs. Eells & Walker,—and at the Dalls under Mr. Hinman. From Mr. Spalding's narrative we make the following extracts:

Our dear brother and sister Whitman have been massacred by the Indians; and with them were murdered twelve other persons; namely, Mr. Rogers, who has been two years preparing for the ministry, with a view to join our mission, John and Francis Sagar, the two eldest boys of the orphan children, Messrs. Kimble of Indiana, Saunders, Hall, Marsh, Hoffman of Elmira, New York, Gillan, Young, Sails and Bulee, of the late immigration, who had stopped at the station to winter. The three first have left large families.

The massacre took place November 29. Mr. Smith and family were at the saw-mill, twenty miles distant, also Mr. Young, his wife and three sons. Next day Mr. Young came down to the station for provisions, and was killed. The others were sent for nine days after the horrible deed and their lives were preserved that they might take charge of the flour mill. But the women and children, to the number of forty-eight, (including my oldest daughter, who was at the station at the time,) were made slaves by the murderers, and treated in the most cruel and brutal manner.

Eight days after the first massacre, Messrs. Gails and Bule, young men who were sick, were dragged from their beds, butchered and cut to pieces in the most horrible manner, in the presence of the women and children, and their dead bodies lay near the door for forty-eight hours in mud and blood; and the captives, and among them was a sister of Bulee, were compelled to pass over them for their wood and water. No one was allowed to wash and bury them till two Nez Perces arrived.

Dr. Whitman had just returned from burying an Indian child, and was engaged in reading.—An Indian, to divert his attention, was in the act of soliciting medicine, while another came behind him, and with a tomahawk struck him on the back of his head. A second blow on the top of the head laid him lifeless on the floor. Then Tilaukait, a principal chief, who has received unnumbered favors from the Doctor, and who was about to be received into the church, fell upon the dead body, and mangled it horribly, cutting the face and head, taking out the heart, &c., &c., and scattering them in the mud. Other bodies were treated in the same brutal manner; and the little captive girls were compelled to pass over them frequently, to torment them. They lay forty-eight hours, (from Monday till Wednesday,) scattered about the premises. None were allowed to gather them up and bury them. Even the distracted widows were not allowed to go out and soothe the last moments of their dying husbands, some of whom lingered long in the agonies of death.

Mrs. Whitman fled up stairs, where she received a wound in the breast, through the window. Mr. Rogers joined her; but they were persuaded to come down, the Indians promising not to kill them. They were immediately taken to the door, however, and shot. Mrs. Whitman died immediately. Mr. Rogers lingered a long time. Mr. Osborn, who was sick, and who with his sick family hid themselves under the floor, heard him as he lay in the mud and blood frequently say, "Lord Jesus, come quickly," till his voice failed. Mr. Hall fled from the Indians, reached Walla Walla, crossed the Columbia, and proceeded on his way to this place; but he has not yet arrived, and Indian report says that he was killed.

I was at the Utilla, twenty miles west of Waiilatpu, at the time of the massacre; and remained there, visiting the sick and preaching to the Indians, till Wednesday morning; at which time I left for the residence of Dr. Whitman. When I was within about three miles of the station, I met a Roman Catholic priest, his interpreter, and a Kayuse.

After some conversation, the Indian wheeled about, and, with great speed, proceeded towards the house of Dr. Whitman, when the priest informed me of what had taken place. He informed me that he had arrived there the night before; that he had that morning baptized the children of the murderers, while the hands of their parents were yet wet with the blood of their devoted Protestant teachers; after which he had assisted two friendly Indians in burying the slain. He said that ten men and Mrs. Whitman had been killed; that a Frenchman in the employ of the Doctor had been spared, as also the women and children; that no Frenchman or Hudson Bay Company's man would be harmed, but only Americans.—This he received from the chief. Having requested him to take charge of my pack-horse, I took some provisions which he had prepared for the night, and gave myself into the hands of God, and turned my horse to the plains.

In the meantime the Indian had returned toward Dr. Whitman's to reload his pistol, and wait for me to come along. He had started with the priest with the intention of killing me; but, stopping to smoke, he had accidentally discharged his pistol in lighting his pipe, and had neglected to reload. After waiting a while, he wheeled again on his track and followed the priest, who had providentially made great speed, and had gone some ten miles before the Indian overtook him. Not finding me there, nor learning from the interpreter what direction I had taken, he returned again to the roint of meeting and took my track; but darkness soon coming on, he was stopped for the night.

Suffice it to say, the Lord delivered me from my pursuer. I travelled nights, and lay concealed in the day time. The second night my horse left me. I had now ninety miles to walk without food; I must leave everything, even my boots, as they were too small. But, praised be the name of God, the fourth night I reached home, without great suffering.

A dispatch was sent immediately from Walla Walla to this place. Mr. Ogden, with two boats and a great amount of property, proceeded with all haste to Walla Walla, sent an order for myself and family and the Americans at my place to join him without delay, and a request to the Nez Perces to deliver us up, with the promise of property in return. In forty-eight hours we were under way, with a portion of our property. Part of it has been left, a part was plundered by the Indians, and some has been given to appease them. We reached Walla Walla in four days, escorted by about forty Nez Perces, to protect us from the Kayuses; who required a large amount of property, which was furnished at the fort. Here we found the captives from Waiilatpu, rescued by the very prompt and judicious efforts of Mr. Ogden. He paid fifty blankets to the Kayuses for the captives, with a large amount of other property, To the Nez Perces he paid twelve blankets, with other articles.—My party swelled the number of the rescued to sixty, and the next day we were in three boats on our way to this place. God gave us the very best of weather for the season, and we reached here today.

On the 10th we proceeded to Oregon city, where Mr. Ogden will deliver us to the Governor. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the Hudson Bay Company, especially to Mr. Ogden, for their timely, prompt, judicious and Christian efforts in our behalf. We owe it, under a kind Providence, to the efforts of Messrs. Ogden and Douglass that we are alive at this place today. May the God of Heaven abundantly reward them! The property of Waiilatpu has all been plundered, and the buildings are demolished. Four hundred troops have already collected, and are on their way to take possession of the Kayuse country and to punish the guilty. Messrs. Eells and Walker have been advised to flee to Colville. God in mercy direct us.

Mad Dogs.—This Summer panic, which usually pervades the cities, was never hit off more piquantly than by Charles Lamb, in the following waggish extract from his published correspondence:

"Excuse my anxiety, but how is Dash? I should have asked if Mrs. P——e kept her rules, and was improving; but Dash came uppermost. The order of our thoughts should be the order of our writings. Goes he muzzled, or aperto ore? Are his intellects sound, or does he wander a little in his conversation? You cannot be too careful to watch the first symptoms of incoherence. The first illogical snarl he makes, to St. Luke's with him. All the dogs here are going mad, if you believe the overseers; but I protest they seem to me very rational and collected. But nothing is so deceitful as mad people to those who are not used to them. Try him with hot water: if he won't lick it up, it is a sign—he does not like it. Does his tail wag horizontally or perpendicularly?—That has decided the fate of many dogs in Enfield. Is his general deportment cheerful? I mean when he is pleased—for otherwise there is no judging. You can't be too careful. Has he bit any of the children yet? If he has, have them shot; and keep him for curiosity, to see if it was the hydrophobia. They say all our army in India had it at one time; but that was in Hyder-Ally's time. Do you get paunch for him? Take care the sheep was sane. You might pull out his teeth, (if he would let you,) and then you need not mind if he were as mad as a bedlamite. It would be rather fun to see his odd ways."

Lettings of Labor in the Auburn Prison.—Five of the most important contracts at the Auburn Prison, were let to contractors on the 6th inst. Hames contract, to Silas Baker at 45½ cents per day. The rates under the old contract was 32 cents, showing an advance of 13½ cents. Cabinet contract, to Parsons, Hewston & Co., the old contractors, at 65 cents; former price 49; advance 16. Tool contract, to E. N. Kitchell, at 51 cents; former price 32; advance 19. Shoe contract, to A. Pettibone, at 65½ cents; former price 56; advance 9½. Carpet contract, to Josiah Barber, the former contractor, at prices varying with the number of men employed upon it; for any number not exceeding 150, 32½ cents; 150 to 200, 35 cents; over 200 38 cents; former price 30; advance, 2½, 5 or 8, as the case may be.

It will be seen, says the Auburn Advertiser, (from which we copy,) that the average advance on former rates is about 33 per cent; and we are told it will make a difference from previous prices, for five years for which the contracts are let, of about $20,000, or an average of nearly $5,000 per year.

New Gleanings from Old Fields.

NUMBER THREE.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., July 1st.

We have just returned from a concert of vocal music, given by the Chicago Quartette Club, a company of teachers consisting of Messrs. Lumbard, Hillis, Jewett and Darby. Though new beginners in their present capacity, they sing well—very well. In such pieces as "We come with song to greet you," "There's a good time coming," they keep excellent time, and each one well sustains his part. Mr. Hillis sings "The Sea" and Mr. Lumbard "My Mother's bible," most admirably; and the two together perform "The grave of Napoleon" with much satisfaction and with marked effect. The heavy bass voice of Mr. Hillis, in the last mentioned piece, is like the roll of an organ. A thousand, thousand thanks to these gentlemen for their refined and inspiriting entertainment. It has revived the sweetest recollections of a distant home and of friends whose gentle voices are the genuine music of our life: and given an upward turn to thought and a mellow tone to the whisperings within.

QUEEN CITY, Lake Michigan, July 4th.

It is impossible to get up a celebration of the Fourth on a steamboat where congeniality does not exist among the cabin passengers; and such a feeling is not here on the Queen City to day. A few aristocratic families from the South, with their slaves, monopolize a disproportionately large share of the gentleman's cabin, and by their self-importance and overbearing disposition to be "master" every where and over all, prevent, in a measure, the mingling of the waters of patriotism. And then it is hard, at the best, to shout the sacred name of "Freedom" in the very ears of bondmen, and to boast of "rights" which were bought with our father's blood, and which, though purchased at so dear a rate, are not extended to men of every hue. There is genuine irony in the homely rhymes of "HOSEA BIGELOW," and would to God it might be felt by every trafficer in human flesh throughout the land.

"I do believe in Freedom's cause
As far away as Paris is;
I love to see her stick her claws
In them infernal Pharyssees:
It's well enough agin a king
To dror resolves and triggers,
But libbaty's a kind of thing
That don't agree with niggers."

The following poem by JOHN H. BRYANT, a younger brother of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, breathes the pure spirit of a freeman; and as it is prophetic, may the God of nations hasten the fulfilment of the prophecy.

As when on Carmel's sterile steep
The ancient prophet bowed the knee,
And seven times sent his servant forth
To look toward the distant sea.

There came at last a little cloud,
Scarce broader than the human hand,
Spreading and swelling till it broke
In showers on all the herbless land;

And hearts were glad, and shouts went up,
And praise to Israel's mighty God,
As the sere hills grew green again,
And verdure clothed the naked sod;

Even so our eyes have waited long,
But now a little cloud appears,
Spreading and swelling as it glides
Onward into the coming years.

Bright cloud of Liberty, full soon,
Far stretching from the ocean strand,
Thy glorious folds shall spread abroad,
Encircling our beloved land.

Like that sweet rain on Judah's hills,
The glorious boon of love shall fall;
And our bond millions shall arise,
As at an angel's trumpet call.

Then shall a shout of joy go up,
The wild glad cry of Freedom come
From hearts long crushed by cruel hands,
And songs from lips long sealed and dumb—

And every bondsman's chain be broke,
And every soul that moves abroad
In this wide realm shall know and feel
The blessed liberty of God.

The Queen City, which was built by Messrs. Bidwell and Banta of Buffalo, and which came out this spring, is a beautiful boat, well built for running. Her length is 250 feet, breadth of beam 30¾ feet, depth of hold 12½ feet, diameter of cylinder 56¼ inches, length of the engine's stroke 9 feet. She is undoubtedly as near perfection as to model and arrangement as any steamboat west of the Hudson river. Capt. TITUS, her commander, is one of the oldest and best seamen that sail into Buffalo harbor. Mr. J. S. RICHARDS, the first mate, though a young man, has been on these lakes eight or ten years, and thoroughly understands the science of his profession. Mr. HUTTON is engineer and Mr. F. PARMELEE clerk. But with some, the most important personage is Mr. BUTTERFIELD, the steward. Travellers like to live well, and Mr. B. is the prince of good providers. No better tables are set on these lakes than on the Queen City.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We would be pleased to hear from our correspondents at Utica, Avon, Hamilton, New Hartford, Massilon, O. and some others who seem to have almost forgotten us.

A MOONLIGHT EXCURSION for the benefit of the Young Men's Association came off in the Steamer Niagara on Friday evening of last week. It was a brilliant affair.

THE DAGUERROTYPE, which may be found at T. Baker's, No. 4, East Seneca st., is a solid and most excellent work. It ought to be widely circulated.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for July, republished by Leonard Scott & Co., has been received. It commences a new volume. Now is the time to subscribe. A. Burke, under the Mansion House, is agent.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK for August was received the first of the week. It is more richly embellished than any other number previously issued, and indeed goes ahead of all the magazines. Godey is not to be outdone.

THE PHRENOLOGICAL AND PHYSIOLOGICAL ALMANAC for 1848, published by Fowlers and Wells, has been issued; and, aside from the purposes of an almanac, it contains much interesting matter on a variety of subjects.

Particulars of French News.—The Paris Slaughter.

From Willmer & Smith's European Times

The details of the insurrection, which broke out in the Paris on the 23d ult., and which was so fearfully disastrous in its effects, are of so much interest and magnitude, that we have given them at length to the exclusion of minor intelligence from that city. Our columns, from time to time, have testified to the constant state of terror produced in Paris, by the conduct of the ultra-Republicans, aided by that of the ouvriers; and for some time previous to the 23d, the attention of the National Assembly had been directed to the best mode of counter-acting their schemes.

Origin of the Insurrection.

Pursuant to their determination to diminish the number of ouvriers, the Government directed that a draught of 3,000 of them, inhabitants of the provinces, should leave town on the 22d. They were supplied with money, and orders for their board and lodging. They left town, but halted outside the barriers, and there spent a large share of their expenses. About three o'clock a body, amounting to 400, returned, and paid a visit to the Executive Government. M. Marie presented himself to hear their grievances. He was addressed by the chief, but M. Marie refused to hear him, as he had been amongst those who attacked the Assembly on the 15th May, and he could not recognise him; then turning to the others, he said, "You are not the slaves of this man, you can explain your grievances." M. Marie entreated them not to be led into rebellion, and assured them that the Government was occupied with the consideration of measures for the improvement of their condition. The delegates withdrew, but did not give an account of their interview. On the contrary, they stated that M. Marie called them slaves. The laborers then commenced shouting "Down with the Executive Commission!" "Down with the Assembly!". Some of them attempted to force into the Church of St. Sulpice, with the intention of ringing the tocsin, but the gates were closed to prevent them. Thence they proceeded to the quays, singing, "We will remain; we will remain!" They next proceeded to the Faubourgs St. Antoine and St. Marceau, and stationed themselves on the Place de la Bastile, crying, "Vive Napoleon!"

FRIDAY.

The Outbreak—Fatal Conflict at the Barricades.

On the morning of the 23d, at 4 o'clock, about 5000 of these men erected barricades at the Porte St. Denis and St. Martin. Many of them were armed with muskets. At about 10 they attacked a post of national guards, and attempted to disarm it. Resistance being made, the assailants fired, and the guard returned the fire. The people fled. At about 3 o'clock the rappel having been beaten for the national guards, nearly one-third turned out. A detachment of the second legion marched against a barricade, and called upon the men who guarded it to surrender. The answer was a discharge of musketry, on which the national guards fired, but after a few rounds they were overpowered and disarmed, and the workmen from the windows of the surrounding houses fired upon them. Three or four were killed, and several wounded. At a later hour the national guards came up in force, and opened a murderous fire on the barricades. The insurgents made an obstinate resistance, but at length abandoned the barricades and fled. Several national guards were killed; a Lieut. Col. and a Chief d'Escadron were wounded. From 30 to 40 of the people were killed in the attack. Gen. de Lamoriciere commanded the troops. The cry of the emeutiers was "Vive la Republique Democratique."

At an early hour the Place de la Concorde had been occupied by an immense body of troops, but very few of the National Guards were to be seen; the same was the case in the Faubourg St. Honore, the Rue de Rivoli, the Rue de la Paix, and the Boulevards. By three o'clock the Hotel de Ville, together with the barricades erected there, were occupied by troops. Bodies of the national guard were stationed at the Tuileries, but while on former occasions, the rappel had not been beaten for two hours before Paris witnessed 150,000 citizens under arms, although it beat for hours, there was not the tenth part of that number seen. In the evening the guard-house on the Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle was attacked by the insurgents, who after a few shots, fled. A small body of the national guards in the Rue d'Aboukir were fired at by the people; they retreated, several being killed and wounded. A similar conflict took place in the Rue de Clery, in which the national guards were successful. Before two o'clock the artillery was planted in a position to command the barricades on the Boulevards. Several barricades were carried by the troops, at the point of the bayonet, in the neighborhood of the Palais du Justice and the Faubourg St. Antoine. At five o'clock a force of artillery was sent up to the railroad St. Denis, when the second legion attacked the barricades at the Porte St. Denis, the national guards being fired upon by the insurgents, answered by a discharge in platoons, firing in the air. This was replied to by an effective discharge by the insurgents; after which the national guards discharged volleys for a quarter of an hour, to which the insurgents answered by a continual dropping fire like that of sharpshooters. It is impossible to describe the effect produced by these fusilades upon the masses which crowded the boulevards, who fled in terror. This was increased when the national guards, from want of amunition, retired before the insurgents.

Dreadful Struggles at the Porte St. Denis and St. Jacques.

In the course of the morning 500 men of the garde mobile were diarmed by a body of the insurgents, headed by an individual in the uniform of an officer of the national guard. At six o'clock the fighting continued, and the number of troops had been increased. 15 national guards were killed at the Porte St. Denis. By a fatal mistake two legions of the national guards fired on each other. The cries among the populace were various.—"Vive Henri V.!" "Vive Napoleon!" "Vive la Republique !" were severally heard. A member of the Assembly raised a flag at the Porte St. Denis, bearing the inscription, "Du pain, au la mort." (Bread or death.) M. Caussidiere at this hour joined the members of the Executive Government on horseback, and they passed along the boulevards. The insurgents occupied a house in the Faubourg St. Denis, from which they fired on the troops. Two hundred prisoners were taken by the national guard on the Place de la Sorbonne.

At nine o'clock, the struggle in the quarter of St. Jacques was most terrible. The insurgents strongly barricaded, fired warmly on the national guard and the troops of the line, who replied.—Cannon was at work. The staff was at the Hotel de Ville. The artillery was at the Pont Notre Dame. The cannon fired from this point on the Rue de la Cite, and the bottom af the Rue St. Jacques, appeared to engage them very much.—Strong barricades existed in the Rue de la Harpe. Much blood was shed there, and Gen. Francois was wounded. In the course of the evening the insurgents captured a post of the garde mobile, and made them march with them. All round the Temple the town was in possession of the insurgents, who were defending themselves with intense energy. The platoon discharges replied to them every five minutes.

It was estimated that not less than 150,000 of the ouvriers and the dregs of the population of Paris and the banlieu were gathered together in the desperate attempt to make another revolution, and recover the mastery.

SATURDAY.

The City declared in a state of Siege.

On the morning of the 24th the Place de la Consorde was crowded with cuirassiers, lancers, and artillery. These troops, with infantry of the line, and the garde mobile occupied the Champs Elysees; the bridge opposite the Chamber and the quays on both sides were similarly filled. The gardens and palace of the Tuileries, and the Place Carousel, were filled with national guards. From nine till twelve o'clock the boulevards continued to be patrolled by troops.

Members of the Assembly also patrolled the principal streets about noon, each escorted by detachments of national guards. At one o'clock notice was given that the capital was declared in a state of seige, and all individuals except those in arms as national guards were ordered to remain in their houses. It was announced that the Executive Commission had abdicated, and that Gen. Cavaignac was appointed Provisional President of the Republic, with powers of a dictatorship. At two o'clock P. M. the streets were swept by columns of the national guard.

Official Decrees and Resignation of the Executive Government.

The following is the decree by which the National Assembly declared Paris in a state of siege:

Art. 1. The National Assembly remains en permanence.

Art. 2. Paris in a state of siege.

Art. 3. All power and authority is delegated to General Cavaignac.

The National Assembly also voted unanimously a decree by which the wives and children of the citizens who had fallen or might fall in the defence of order were to be adopted by the country.

After this decree was passed, the Executive Council resigned its powers in the following letter:

Monsieur le President—The Executive Committee would think it was wanting alike in its duty and its honor if it withdrew before sedition and a public peril. It withdraws only on a vote of the Assembly. In remitting to it the power with which it invested us, we return to the ranks of the National Assembly, to devote ourselves with you to the common danger, and to the safety of the republic.

LAMARTINE, ARAGO, LEDRU ROLLIN, GARNIER PAGES, MARIE, the members of the Executive Committee. PAGNARRE, Secretary.

24th June.

The following proclamation was published:

National Guards—As on all occasions, you have responded with courage to the appeal of the country. Wherever barricades have been set up by the factions, you have up to this moment destroyed them. Their colors, which are those of all pretenders, have been trampled by you under foot. In a few hours the republic has shown that, with the ever ready and ever spontaneously admirable succour of all its citizens, national guards, army, garde mobile, and garde republicaine, it has nothing to dread from factions. Citizens, you have done much in the interest of order and liberty, but remain on foot as long as there are duties to perform; and these duties are immense. Your enemies, the enemies of the country, are on the alert; be also on the alert. Be vigilant on every point, be vigilant during the whole night in every quarter. Be vigilant in order to secure the triumph of order and respect for property, if insensate men should dare to attack it. National guards of the great city, show to every body, by your attitude and your energy, that you are really the first children of the republic: and that you will defend it everywhere and against all enemies. (Signed by the members of the Executive Government.)

Very large detachments of national guards from the environs and farther points, arrived during the day, in the capital. From 1 till 4 o'clock all communication between the Madeleine and the Assembly and the eastern part of the town, was stopped. Detachments were placed in the Foreign office, and across all the streets leading towards the Palais Royal and the eastern quarters.

On the dictatorship being conferred on General Cavaignac, he issued the following notice:—If at noon the barricades are not removed, mortars and howitzers will be brought, and by which shells will be thrown which will explode behind the barricades, and in the apartments of the houses occupied by the insurgents.

Defeat of the Insurgents at the Pantheon.

At half-past 3 the insurgents were driven to the Pantheon and there surrounded; they fought desperately and with a courage which would be admirable if devoted to a just cause. The Pantheon was recovered from the insurgents, after 300 discharges of cannon, about 5 o'clock.

Fourteen battalions of the line and the 21st regiment were around the chamber during the day. A battery of artillery with matches lighted were on the quay. Under the peristyle of the chamber two field howitzers were placed. The cuirassiers were in great force on the Place de la Concorde.

Desperate Contest and Slaughter at the Church of St. Severin and the Clos St. Lazare.

The contest near the Northern Railway was most desperate. The head-quarters of the insurgents was the Church of St. Severin, situate in the quarter of St. Jacques, near the river. The fortress and citadel was the Faubourg St. Antoine, occupied and barricaded throughout. On the other side the insurrection was in the quarter of St. Marcel, St. Victor, and the lower part of the quarter St. Jacques. Paris was thus lapped in a large semicircle by a line of fortifications. The Clos St. Lazare was fortified so as to be rendered almost impregnable. It was protected by immense barricades, and the insurgents were entrenched in an hospital now erecting. This post was connected with advanced works extending to the heights of the Faubourgs St. Denis, St. Martin, La Chapelle, La Villette, the Temple, the quarter called Popincourt, and the Faubourg St. Antoine.—There was great slaughter here. The national guards arrived from Poissy and Pontoise drew up before the barricade of the Clos St. Lazare, and at the first fire fifty of them fell.

The Pantheon the insurgents defended with four pieces of cannon. They had also seized the College Henry IV. behind it, and this church was the key of the position extending through the quarter of St. Jacques to the church of St. Severin. According to the Siecle, there were 1500 national guards lying dead in the church of St. Severin, who fell in the slaughter at this spot.

The church St, Gervais, immediately behind the Hotel de Ville, had to be taken from the insurgents with cannon. The bridge of Notre Dame had to be swept by cannon, as well as the Quai aux Fleurs. A house of business, six stories high, called "La Belle Jardiniere," on this quay, was demolished by cannon-balls. It had been taken possession of by the insurgents. At six o'clock, by the reduction of the place Lafayette, the Clos St. Lazare was isolated.

Horrid Butcheries by both the Troops and Insurgents.

A dreadful act of butchery was committed on this day (Saturday) by the insurgents at one of the barricades in the Faubourg St. Germain.—They had taken five of the garde mobile prisoners, and held them apart without injury. Hearing, however, that the troops of the line were coming down in force, they determined to abandon the barricade, but at the same time they came to another terrible determination, which they forthwith carried into execution—they cut the throats of the five prisoners! The lifeless bodies of the unfortunate lads, for none of them had exceeded the age of eighteen, were found still warm when the troops of the line and a party of the guard mobile came up. This act had the effect of exciting the most intense exasperation, and particularly amongst the garde mobile. 1500 of the insurgents had surrendered on the Place du Pantheon. These men were being led across the garden of the Luxembourg, when a large body of the garde mobile, who were then guarding the palace and gardens, being unable to restrain their desire of vengeance for their murdered comrades, sent a volley into the body thus passing, and killed upwards of 100.

Prisoners were brought in from time to time to the building in which the National Assembly sits. Amongst one batch of twenty-five was a young girl dressed in male attire, who was most active in supplying ammunition to the insurgents.

List of Killed and Wounded.

The wounds of General Bedeau, M. Clement Thomas, and M. Dornes were not severe, but they were confined to their beds. It was hoped that the life of M. Bixio would be saved. M. Bixio was Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic at Turin, and a representative of the people.

M. Amadee Thayer has died of his wounds. He was the son-in-law of General Bertrand, the friend of Napoleon.

The 24th regiment had lost 200 men. The 29th regiment had suffered severely. A party coming from Amiens to the assistance of the insurgents, had been stopped at St. Denis and disarmed.

The number of dead and severely wounded is terrific. The following statement was given: "Commander Mason, killed; General Francais, killed: Aascal, Lieut. Colonel, 11th legion, killed; the Representants Vavin and Kuinet, killed.

SUNDAY.

Hostilities Recommenced — Reinforcement of Troops—Numerous Arrests of the Populace.

On Sunday morning the insurgents had collected in those quarters of the faubourgs which are beyond the Canal St. Martin, and in the Faubourg Poissonniere. Every house in La Villette and La Chapelle was converted into a fort, and every window was a loophole.

On the Place Maubert, after two hours, the insurgents were driven out, and took refuge at the top of the Rue St. Victor. The troops followed, and kept up a fire on them In the Faubourg St. Marceau the insurgents defended their barricades with obstinacy. At this point the women threw boiling oil and water from the windows on the troops.

Regiments of the line, infantry and cavalry, continued to arrive during the morning from the departments. At six several legions of National Guards from the provinces marched into Paris.—The quarter of the capital around the Chamber and the Tuileries was literally covered with troops, who bivouacked in the streets and places. The Place de la Concorde and Champs Elysees presented the aspect of a camp.

The engineers soon began the work of mining the houses where the insurgents had taken refuge, the staircases of which had been destroyed. Several thousand prisoners were taken among the insurgents; many of them were immediately shot. The vaults of Notre Dame, the Louvre, the Tuileries, and the assembly, were filled with them.

All circulation through the streets was interdicted, except to such as were armed as National Guards, or those who bore passes, or servants going for the necessary articles of provisions.

Vehicles from the Pompes Funebres were seen passing everywhere, to carry away the dead.—Never was such a spectacle witnessed as Paris presented.

The Faubourg St. Antoine attacked by the Troops, with great Slaughter—Determined Stand of the Insurgents.

A delay allowed the insurgents in the Faubourg St. Antoine to surrender having expired without any reply, the operations commenced. The first barricade was vigorously attacked and carried, but not without considerable slaughter on the side of the assailants. Col. Banaud, of the 48th regt. of the line, and several officers, were killed.—General Bouquet, of the engineers, arrived at the Place de la Bastille, with the firemen and sappers.—Some houses were in an instant blown up, and several barricades thus turned were captured without loss. On some points the insurgents had dug trenches, against which artillery was unavailable. They fired from within, and, on the approach of the troops, escaped through passages opened in the cellars of the houses.

A large body sallied from the suburb towards noon, entered the island of St. Louis, and formed a barricade on the Pont des Tournelles, which was undergoing repairs. They were then kept in check by troops stationed in the wine stores on the opposite side, and were actually placed within two fires. The enclosure of St. Lazare was reoccupied in the morning by the insurgents, who carried away ten small pieces of artillery belonging to the Chateau Rouge, which they loaded with stones and pieces of broken bottles. On the Quay de la Megisserie some ruffians fired from a window on a battalion of troops of the line, and escaped by a back door in the street. Others were, at the same time, erecting a barricade close by, in the Rue de Bethizy; but a patrol of National Guards dispersed them, and they fled, throwing their arms in the streets. A battery of artillery had been placed on the hill of Montmartre, and measures were adopted to prevent the insurgents from gaining possession of that important position.

At two o'clock it was announced that a resolution had been taken by Gen. Cavaignac to bombard Montmartre. Several places in the Clos St. Lazare and its environs were set on fire by the insurgents.

The combat continued during the day on many points, but became isolated on all for want of communication. The insurgents still held out in the Faubourgs St. Antoine and du Temple, on the heights of Montmarte, and the Barriere St. Denis. At the Faubourg St. Antoine barricades had been made, and were still occupied by the insurgents, but no attempt was made to take them: the troops surrounded them to oblige the insurgents to lay down their arms. At the Faubourg du Temple, the Rue du Faubourg was occupied by the line, by the pompiers, and the garde national or garde mobile, but they were still fighting on the banks of the canal. The boulevard was also occupied by the troops to the top of the Rue Filles du Calvaire. The barricade of the Barriere Rochechouart was taken. At Montmartre they were still fighting, but the firing was stayed until the Clos St. Lazare was carried by assault; the greater number of insurgents found there were taken prisoners. About 6,000 muskets and ammunition were taken.

MONDAY.

Suppression of the Insurrection on the left Bank—the Archbishop of Paris acting as Mediator.

On Monday morning there was an awful stillness. Few individuals were seen, and no carriages, except ammunition wagons and those which brought supplies for the soldiers. The "generale" was beaten at 5 o'clock in all quarters.

At 9 o'clock the President of the Assembly called together the members then in the palace, and announced that the insurgents were altogether suppressed on the left banks of the river; on the right bank the Faubourg du Temple was taken in the night; the barrier of the Temple was free: the Faubourg St. Antoine alone resisted.

On a mission of peace of the Archbishop of Paris and the representatives Larabit, Galli-Cazale, and Drault, four delegates of the insurgents presented an address to the Assembly, demanding an armistice, and promising to surrender the Faubourg on condition of preserving their titles and rights of citizens. The President replied, that if they wished to re-enter the ranks of the Republic they must destroy their barricades themselves and make their submission. If the barricades were not destroyed, General Lamoriciere, and General Perrot, who took the command of the Hotel de Ville after General Duvivier was wounded, were simultaneously to attack the two opposite sides of the Faubourg St. Antoine.

TUESDAY.

Results of the Insurrection.

On Tuesday morning the rappel was beaten again. The barriers were strictly guarded.

An exact estimate of the loss of life, and the number of wounded was unattainable. The prisoners taken among the insurgents were immediately deposited in the vaults and dungeons under the Tuileries, the Louvre, the Palais Royal, the Chamber of Deputies, the Hotel de Ville, and in the various prisons. Four or five of the members of the Assembly were among the killed and about as many the wounded. Fourteen general officers have been put hors du combat, several being killed. The loss in superior officers has been greater than in the most brilliant engagements during the wars of Napoleon.

Although the insurrections was considered quelled, it was not expected that the capital would be altogether free from partial distrurance for many days. A body of the insurgents who had not submitted, and intrenched themselves in the cemetery Pere la Chaise, and other detached bodies had taken refuge in La Vil ette and other parts of the northern and eastern "Banlieue." They were surrounded by some regiments of infantry, and summoned to lay down their arms. They refused, excepting on condition that they should be set at liberty, appeared to be preparing to make some resistance, when some shots went off from their side, one of which struck a soldier. The troops imagined themselves betrayed, and without further ceremony opened a murderous fire upon the insurgents, drove them from their position in the cemetery into the neighboring vineyards, and as quarter was no longer the order of the day, almost every one of the unhappy men were destroyed. In other parts of the same neighborhood a vast number of prisoners were taken, who were carried into Paris.

The leaders and instigators of the insurrection are to be brought before a court-martial, and tried as rebels taken in arme. The other prisoners are to be immediately sent beyond the seas.

The Bureaux have named a committee to investigate the affairs of the 15th May, and the cause of the insurrection on the 23rd of June. The commissioners named are M. M. Pougeard, Waldeck, Rousseau, de Darcy, Delespaul, Wirhape, Laudrin, Odilon Barrot, de Beaumont (Symme,) Goudehaux, Flandin, Beauchart, do Mornay Dahirel Lanjuinais, and Latrade.

A great number of the insurgents were led away by demagogues and if some of them had money a very great portion were induced by excess of misery.

A Female Pedestrian.—A woman of about thirty-five years of age arrived in our city a few days ago, from New Jersey, accompanied by an idiot child seven years old. She says the whole distance from New Jersey to Evansville was accomplished on foot, carrying at the same time her child and a heavy bundle. At Evansville, the kindness of some citizens procured her a passage on a boat to this city. Upon her arrival, being entirely destitute of means, she applied to Major Armor, keeper of the calaboose, for assistance.—That gentleman immediately made her condition known, and raised a sufficient amount to take her to her friends, who reside on Spoon river, in Illinois. She represented that her family—four in number—died shortly previous to her leaving New Jersey, and having no relations in that section of country, made this extraordinary effort, after a failure to obtain sufficient means, to reach her friends in the west.—St. Louis Republican.

Wood-Carving.—This has hitherto been a slow and expensive process, which seemed to set machinery at defiance, But Invention, which in other branches of art has achieved such wonders, has at length extended its triumphs to this. By a process, the nature of which we do not understand, perfect fac similes can be produced, of the most rich and costly carvings, at a cost so low as to bring them within the reach of all. Samples of panels, &c., produced by this process have been shown us, and are all that could be desired. In one hour, a machine will turn out work that would occupy the most skilful manual laborer weeks, if not months. A patent for the invention has been secured, both in England (where it originated) and in the United States.—Tribune.

O! Listen, Man.

The following impressive passage is from the "Husband and Wife's Grave," a poem by Richard H. Dana. It is worthy of its transcendent subject, and appeals with deepest significance to the inner consciousness of man.

A voice within us speaks the startling word,
"Man, thou shalt never die!" Celestial voices
Hymn it around our souls; according harps,
By angel-fingers touched when the mild stars
Of morning sang together, sound forth still
The song of our great immortality!
Thick, clustering orbs, and this our fair domain,
The tall, dark mountains, and the deep-toned seas,
Join in this solemn, universal song.
O, listen ye, our spirits! drink it in
From all the air! 'Tis in gentle moonlight;
'Tis floating in day's setting glories; night,
Wrapp'd in her sable robe, with silent step
Comes to our bed and breathes it in our ears:
Night and the dawn, bright day and thoughtful eve,
All time, all bounds, the limitless expanse,
As one vast, mystic instrument are touched
By an unseen, living Hand, and conscious chords
Quiver with joy in the great jubilee:
The dying hear it, and as sounds of earth
Grow dull and distant, wake their passing souls
To mingle in this heavenly harmony.

VIOLATING THE SABBATH.—A rigid Sabbatarian, who occasionally exhorts in Church, and fills the office of Justice of the Peace in a Western village, not long since, went on a deer hunt, with a party composed of five or six young hunters. By some unaccountable mistake he lost his reckoning, and much to his mortification he found, on reference to his papers on the third day of the hunt, that it was Sunday, when he had supposed it was Saturday. He opened the morning with prayer, and told his companions that as a Christian and a Magistrate, he could not hunt that day, and accordingly drew forth his pocket-Bible and commenced reading.

His wordly-minded companions, who thought with the Baltimore bank men, that 'there were no Sabbaths in revolutionary times,' took the hounds and started in pursuit of game. It was not long before the whole pack were in full cry, and the worthy Magistrate, on looking up from the sacred volume, discovered a fine buck making for the camp. Without a minute's deliberation, he seized a loaded rifle and plugged the deer between the antlers.

"Gentlemen," said he, when his friends came to the spot, "it is contrary to the laws of Moses and the Revised Statutes of Pennsylvania, to travel on Sunday, and for that reason I shot that fellow, still I have violated the Sabbath as a Christian, while I have maintained the dignity of the law as a Magistrate, and acting in the latter capacity."

"If we should scare up another?"

"I'd shoot the rascal for travelling on Sunday!"

PROSPECTUS
OF THE
Western Literary Messenger.

VOLUME ELEVEN.

The time has come when Buffalo, with a population of forty-five thousand inhabitants, is able to support a MONTHLY MAGAZINE; consequently, on the first of September, the Messenger will be merged into such a periodical, and be issued promptly on the first of each month.—It will be printed on new type and beautiful white paper, the pages to remain the present size, and their number to be the same as the Columbian Magazine and the three dollar periodicals generally. The pages, however, will be set in solid matter, and thus afford, at least one fifth more reading on an equal space, than is ordinarily found in magazines, making the Messenger, with the terms unaltered, the cheapest monthly magazine of which we have any knowledge.

The features of the publication will not be materially altered, except that the monthly summary of news, foreign, domestic and local, will all be carefully sifted, by the editor, re-written and condensed; and such incidents mainly, will be recorded, as will be embraced in the future history of our city, the country and the world. The literary department will be composed of the choicest selected miscellany and original articles on the greatest variety of subjects—such as will tend to instruct as well as amuse.—The publication of the lectures before the Young Men's Association we are happy to say, will be continued, probably one a month. These are the most useful reading we can give, and the fact that our country subscribers are pleased with them, speaks well for their taste and mental cultivation.

Mr. J. CLEMENT, to whose energy and ability the Messenger owes, in a great measure, its wide circulation and high reputation, will remain the Editor.

The terms of the publication for single subscribers and clubs in the country, will remain the same as heretofore. City subscribers, whose copies are delivered, will be charged $1.75 instead of $2, 0. Will our present subscribers, and all persons friendly to the work, aid in extending its circulation. Old subscribers who have had it in clubs heretofore, can receive it another year at the same rate, allowing the money is forwarded strictly in advance.

VOL. X. BUFFALO, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1848. NO. 26.

For the Western Literary Messenger.

A November Day in Midsummer.

How sensitive to sadness such a day
As this doth make the soul—there seems a deep
And deadening dimness which doth slowly creep
Upon our very lives, and steal away
The bliss of being. Then the gushing play
Of that bright fount, existence, seems to sleep
Within our pulseless hearts. We cannot keep Awake to all the beings bright that stray—
The myriad beautiful and happy things
That are rejoicing 'round us, and a shroud
Binds the benummed soul, or it is filled
With shapeless phantoms; and a thick dark cloud
Seems hovering o'er us with its damp cold wings
Till heart, and soul, and breath seem clogged and chilled.

ROYALTON, N. Y., July 16, 1848. J. H. BIXBY.

A Tale of the Desert.

FROM THE FRENCH.

In these days of diffusive benevolence and sentimentality, when acts of individual devotion and generosity seem to be forgotten, or their performance deemed unnecessary, by the constant increasing influence of combinations and societies of all sorts and names, the following incidents, related by Dumas, in his "Le Sinai," have a peculiar beauty and significance—not the less to me, because the actors belonged to a race whom we, in our self-righteousness, are accustomed to style, "poor' benighted heathen." The unwearied devotion of the poor, old father touches the heart, but the disinterested generosity of that wild Arab of the Desert claims our admiration and reverence—it was heroic; nay, more—it was Christ-like.

All travellers speak enthusiastically of the beauty of the valley of the Nile. Annually, God causes the water to overflow the banks, thus performing a miracle, as it were, for the benefit of the whole nation; but the pacha alone reaps the profits. The harvests along the fertile banks, from Daimetta to Elphantine, are his. Beyond this limit live many independent wandering tribes, whose riches, like those of the patriarchs of old, consist in their flocks and herds.

The nearest are the negro tribes of Darfaur and Kardofur, and, more than once, the pacha has made them feel that they constituted a part of his dominions, by raising human contributions, instead of those paid in golden grain by his subjects, in Lower Egypt and the Delta. Once in five or six years, he sends a regiment of cavalry, and some companies of infantry, into those regions, and then commences a chase, similar to those in which the princes of India pursue the wild beasts of the jungles.

A great circle is formed, which gradually converges towards some given point—usually a mountain—which forms the centre. Old men and young, women, children, and cattle, all retreat before the fearful band which surrounds them, until like the wild beasts of Camboul and Deccan, all the different races are crowded at the base, side or summit of a mountain, which they cover like a moving, parti-colored carpet, while the rocks echo with their fearful cries, uttered in twenty different idioms.

Then commences one of those scenes of which we, in Europe have no conception. Some preferring death to slavery, sell their lives as dearly as possible, or throw themselves from the rocks into the deep abysses below—the feeble in body and mind, crawl, like reptiles, into the deep caverns from which they are forced by the fire and smoke.

Then a selection is made. All that will serve as slaves, servants, soldiers or mistresses, are taken, conducted in droves to the banks of the Nile, and go to people the bazars of Cairo, Suez and Alexandria, or to swell the armies of the pacha.

None but old men and children are left in their villages. All the intermediate generation disappears in a day, as at that time, when Jehovah to punish the oppressors of his people, struck the first-born of Pharaoh, seated on the throne, to the first-born of the maiden that turned the mill

The caravan of slaves thus taken from Kordafar and Darfaur, follow the banks of the White River to its junction with the Nile—then, as that river makes a circuit of about fifty leagues or so to the north, the stern drivers of this troop of men deem it a waste of time to follow its course longer. Preparations are then made to traverse the seventy leagues of desert that extend between Halfay, where they leave the Nile, and Korti, where they again strike its course. Water and provision for eight days, are taken, and the whole caravan plunges into that sea of sand beneath the burning sun of the tropics. Once in motion, nothing is permitted to arrest their march Necessity drives them; she unleashes behind them those demons of the desert, hunger and thirst, and through the whole day they speed onward, like waves before a tempest.

The weak and weary fall, but no one stops to raise them; the mothers, who have not been forced to leave their babes behind, lie down with them in their arms, by the way-side, and remain there. The hyenas and jackalls follow in the rear, as the wolves followed the army of Attila, while each night is passed at some ancient station, recognised only by the scattered bones, and, each morning, on departing, they leave behind several corses to augment the fearful ossuary Sometimes it happens that the Simoon rises like a giant, and shakes over them his wings of fire, until master and slave disappear beneath the Nubian sand, like the army of Cambyses, in the desert of Ammon. Then the pacha awaits his soldiers and prisoners in vain—he makes anxious inquiries, but their voices are silent—their footsteps effaced, they have disappeared like a single man, under whose feet the earth has suddenly opened.

Such was the account given by Malek, the wandering Arab, who joined our encampment at night fall. Eighteen months before he had started as guide to an English traveller, from Cairo, and had followed the Nile, to the mouth of the White river, where, as the traveller wished to continue his journey across Abyssinia, he expressed a wish to return to his tribe. The traveller payed him double the sum he had promised, and dismissed him. Malek purchased a camel, and set his face toward home, following no particular route, after the manner of the Arabs, guided only by the stars.

He reached Kordovan, and traversed its entire length, now bivouacking with his camel, wanting like that, both water and food, now asking hospitality at the door of some poor negro cabin, where, to his great astonishment, he invariably found none but old men, ready to fall into the grave, and young children. On the northern frontier of the State, two days journey from Obeid, its capital if such a collection of huts deserves the name, he was hospitably entertained in a cabin, containing, as usual, an old negro and a young child. The old man and the child both wept bitterly—one asking for his daughter, and the other for its mother. The former recognised Malek as an Arab of Lower Egypt, and related to him the above history.

When the troops of the pacha swept the country the last time, his son-in-law, after defending his family to the last, preferring death to slavery, threw himself from a rock: the daughter was carried into slavery, and the old man and young child left behind as useless.

Taking the child by the hand, the old man left his home, followed the chain of mountains that extend from Darfaur to the Red Sea, and along the banks of the White river, until he arrived at Senaar, or the Blue river. There bent every day, for six months, over the water, he sought the gold dust which is mingled with it. Part of this he exchanged for the plumes of the ostrich, and returned into Kordofar, with wealth sufficient to ransom his daughter. But, feeble and old, exhausted by his long journey, and months of labor, his strength failed him: he could not reach Cairo, and had lain down in his cabin, to weep over his useless wealth, when Malek came and begged his hospitality.

When the old man had finished the relation of his misfortunes, Malek said—

"The tents of my tribe are near Mount Sinai. Sinai is eight day's journey from Cairo. Give me thy gold dust and thy ostrich feathers; I will go to Cairo and ransom thy child."

When he encountered us in the desert, Malek had nobly fulfilled the sacred promise he had made to the old negro, and was on his way to rejoin his family, after an absence of eighteen months.—Nonpariel.

The Nautilus.—The interesting poetical fiction connected with the argonaut or paper nautilus, wherein it is represented as sailing on the surface of the sea, its fragile shell forming the hull of its vessel, the two expanded membranous arms being erected and acting as sails, while the six tapering arms were used as oars, has, for ages, rendered that animal an object of interest; and notwithstanding that these particulars have been proved fictitious, recent researches into its true history have shown the mollusk to be no less deserving consideration from its every-day actions, than from the exploded functions poetically ascribed to it. From the excessive thinness of the beautiful shell, to which by the way, the animal has no muscular attachment, and its extreme fragility, it is constantly liable to fracture by being tossed about at the mercy of the waves. When this happens, and it is no unusual occurrence, the animal instinctively repairs the fracture by a new deposition of shelly matter to the broken portion, by means of the membranous mantle. This circumstance, observed in a number of argonauts kept in confinement in an open cage sunk in the Bay of Messina, by Madame Power, removed the doubts of naturalists as to the animal being really the architect of its own habitation; since the regular increase in the size of the shell to correspond with the growth of the animal was witnessed, as well as the power of repairing the shell when broken either intentionally or accidentally. —Westminster Review.

The Moral Dignity and Influence of Humble Life.

True dignity of character is as often found in the ranks of humble life, as in the higher conditions of society. The humble occupations of life are, perhaps, quite as congenial to virtue, as are those dignified with a higher place in the conventional arrangements of society. They are, doubtless, more so. The occupations of the Farmer well illustrate this. All his acts have a direct relation to, and a close connexion with the laws of God, as instituted for the sustenance of life—the ultimate end of the highest moral virtue. He casts the seed into the earth—a picture of humility; and the very highest order of moral dignity is only accessible to the foot of humility. Obedience to law, faith and hope, are impressed upon his mind, at every turn. The teachings of his daily toil are those of omnipotent truth, and his labors are productive only as they are in harmony with immutable laws. As he looks out upon his lands, especially at this season of the year, he may "drink in" beauty and loveliness; and if the farmer does not grow in moral dignity, it is not because God does not urge him to do so by every argument that can be addressed to him through his honest, severe, but glorious occupation. There is a voice in every thing around him, and in all the landscape that skirts the walk of life, that woos him on to virtue.

The social affections in humble life are strengthened by its condition of dependence. The practice of the highest order of moral duties is essential to true dignity, and therefore, in humble life are often found the brightest examples of moral worth, although they may, and often do escape the notice of the world.

A humble parent, who has drank at the fountain of pure morality, whose very condition is the plainest path to that fountain, and who is moved toward it with an intensity of affection that a humble condition only can inspire, is a sublime spectacle of moral dignity that kings may well envy. See that widowed mother, for instance, whose very existence here is wrapped up in that of a large family of children, dependent on her daily labors for the food they eat, the clothes they wear, and all that makes life possible, endurable, or its manner respectable. Notice the servitude to which she nerves her mind! notice the humility which she moves to her purpose! notice the thousand ingenious shifts and contrivances to which her mind resorts, to make her labors acceptable to those for whom she is employed, and then the hundred other turns, to make the little pittance count as much as it can be made to do, in furtherance of her holy object! Is there no moral dignity there? Do not angels of mercy commune with her? Every tear of sympathy that falls in secret, is it not weighed in a balance that gives no false meaning, and is it not counted and laid up for her as "treasure in heaven?"

We do not say, that moral dignity does not exist in the higher walks of life; but, we do say, that, strip the examples that this condition furnish of their artificial embellishments, and perhaps even pride might look a little surprised at the comparison with the examples of those who walk along through life without display or ostentation, and who are not troubled much, even if their labors are not appreciated, nor their motives understood by those who have no power to apprehend them.

The true nature, dignity and influence of humble life, have, doubtless, never been fully understood. The great body of the People belong to, or claim kindred with this class. It is the hope of our country. When corruption in high places has put the nation in jeopardy, then this great power moves itself, and sets all things right. It stops not to inquire the way of those who would only misdirect them. By the plain quiet fireside, in the humble and unpretending cabin, with none to overawe, 'molest or make afraid,' the mind has looked out upon the strife which corruption breeds, and knowing no party but truth, virtue and honor, it consigns corruption to its fate—a fate that always awaits it when it becomes dangerous.

How admirably our political system is arranged! including in its composition the important element of self-renovation—securing its perpetuity! The humble and virtuous mother, prompted by a mother's affection, in imparting moral instruction to her darling boy, with an earnestness and interest of which a mother only is capable, may not be aware that she is contributing an important portion to that element which is to preserve her country and its institutions, and ameliorate the condition of the world!

Intellectual Reading.—As understanding what is read is the great rule for good reading, children should be habituated from the first, to give an uninterrupted attention to the meaning of what they read. With this view, they should be frequently and regularly called upon to close their books, and to give in their own language the substance of the sentence or passage just read. Such questioning, it is evident, fixes the attention of the children upon the subject of their lesson; and the answering in their own words, gives them a habit of expressing themselves in suitable language.

At first, and perhaps for a considerable time, teachers will find some difficulty in applying the explanatory or intellectual method. Children will often be slow to speak, or perhaps silent, even when able to give the required explanation, and time, so precious in a large school, will, in consequence, be lost. But this is because they have not been accustomed to give explanations. "Exercise them," therefore, from the beginning, "as much as possible upon the meaning of such words and sentences as admit of being defined and explained." Begin with the easiest and most familiar words; and express yourself satisfied with almost any explanation the child may be able to give—provided he has a conception of its meaning. Do not wait for, or expect accurate, or any definitions from children. Encourage them to say just what they think of it, and they will learn to describe it with ease and correctness.

Flood in Canada.—A correspondent of the Journal of Quebec, writing from St. Paul's Bay under date of 5th inst., says that a heavy rain of 24 hours on the 3d caused a rise in the river Du Gouffre, of twelve feet at least, which caused it to overflow its banks North and South, carrying away mills, bridges, wharves, trees, and every thing it met with. Is enveloped the whole of the village on the North side, throwing down bridges, fences, &c., and forming deep ravines in its devious course. Nearly all the bridges were carried away, and the scows and passenger boats having shared the same fate, the inhabitants were without any means of communication with each other.—Wood yards were completely emptied of their contents of timber and plank. A schooner had disappeared, gone no one knows whither. The damage must be very great.

The Seventeen Year Locust Again.

From the Rochester Daily Advertiser.

As this Locust now abounds in the counties of Monroe, Livingston, and some others, the first question asked is, the reason of the name? Linneas called it Cicada septem decem, because the cycle of its appearance is seventeen years. It appeared in this county in 1814, 1831, and 1848; in Orange county in 1775, 1792, 1809 and 1826; and at Marietta, Ohio, in 1795, 1812, 1829 and 1846. The earliest record I have seen, is in Pennsylvania, in 1715.

Its re-appearance in seventeen years had been noticed and recorded long before the earliest of these years. It is, however, evident, that in different and distinct sections of the country, its re-appearance has not been in the same years.—From Florida to Maryland and Pennsylvania, it has appeared the same year, but not the same as in the eastern part of Massachusetts, in this county, on the Susquehanna in Pennsylvania, and in Ohio.

It is very different from Cicada Canicularis, the Locust which annually appears in small numbers in July. The seventeen year Locusts come in vast multitudes, covering fences at first, and filling the air and forests, and often producing a roar by their buzz which is really stunning, and greatly annoying to the inhabitants. During a shower their din ceases wholly.

The time of their appearance differs in different climates; much earlier in Georgia than in this state, and earlier too in the same place in the warmer seasons and warmer soils. This year they appeared in Mendon in this county, on a warm and dry soil, covered with winter wheat, on May 27th. The grubs crept from their holes in the earth, upon the herbage, trees, fences, &c., fastened themselves by their strong claws, and burst open on their backs, and the Locust came forth with his six legs, two pairs of wings, a bill or probosis for sucking up the gum, honey and mucilage on the surface of the leaves, (for this is their food,) and the males furnished with their drum and air-sacks for their music, and the females furnished with a cutter and borer for depositing their eggs in the branches of trees. They live till this work is finished, or about a month.

In about sixty days the young grubs, hatched from the small eggs, having eat out from the bark or wood, moved by a wonderful instinct, give up their hold upon the twigs and fall to the earth. They are then small, having six legs, two well fitted for digging, and at once make their way into the earth, there to live and grow for nearly seventeen years. When they come to the surface to be transformed into a Locust, they are about an inch long, and more than one-fourth of an inch in diameter, strong, plump, a good looking grub, and so fat that they are excellent food for turkeys and hogs, and have been made into good soap. That they find food enough in the earth, is obvious from their growth and condition. The Locusts seem to be harmless insects, not injurious to vegetation, except as the limbs of trees are destroyed by the eating out of the young.

I have heard of one authentic instance of the female stinging a person and inflicting a severe wound. The insects had been put into a hat, which was then worn, and the stinging was probly in self-protection and self-defence. Y. D.

Mr. Brownson denounces the Italian liberals, who are laboring in behalf of the regeneration of their native land, as "miscreants—the spawn of hell, who are doing their best to desolate Europe, and replunge the nations civilized by Christianity, into the darkness of barbarism." That will do.—Boston Transcript.

LAURA BRIDGMAN AND HER BARREL OF FLOUR.—We wonder if any of our young friends have not heard or read something of this interesting American girl? If there are any of our young readers to whom the story of Laura Bridgman is unknown, we would merely say, that she is a young girl, in the Institution for the Blind, in Boston, Mass., United States of America, deaf, dumb and blind. Just think of that condition a moment. Every avenue to her mind is cut off, except the sense or feeling. We believe that her sense of smelling is impaired so as to render her insensible to the sweet breath of flowers. Poor girl, had she been born among the heathen, she would have been left to perish as a worthless thing, to whom life was of no value. But there were those who saw in her a candidate for immortal glory, a being that could be made to sing, and hear the angels sing in heaven, and see and taste all the beatitudes enjoyed there by spirits that never were pent in clayey tabernacles as windowless as hers on earth. And they went to work and educated that single sense of feeling to the nicest susceptibilities. And they made a wooden alphabet, wooden model of ideas, all that had been, are and shall be in the world. And these she touched most thoughtfully, as if listening for the music of a new existence; and wonderful! her fingers' ends became endowed with faculties almost miraculous, and filled her mind with astonishing revelations of things present, past and to come. Her little white, whispering, loving, listening fingers touched the record of the olden years, beyond the flood, till they felt the branches of the forbidden tree, and the locks of murdered Abel, and the surges that beat against Noah's helmless ark, and the cradle of the Hebrew baby in the bullrushes, and the tremulous base of Sinai, and David's harp, and the face of the infant Emmanuel in the manger, and the nails that fastened him to the cross, and their deep prints, that unbelieving Thomas felt after the resurrection; and with his faith, on shorter evidence, she had cried, in the voiceless language of the heart: "My Lord! and my God!"

How she plied at morning, noon and night, those fingers! wonderful fingers! It seemed that the very finger of God had touched them with miraculous susceptibilities of fellowship with the spirit world and that around her. She put them upon the face of his written word, and felt them thrilled to her heart with the pulsation of great thoughts of love to man. And then she felt for others' woe.

Poor child! God bless her richly. She reached her short arms to feel after some less happy than she in the condition of this life! some whose fingers' end had not reached such sweet paragraphs of heaven's mercy as hers had done; some who had not seen, heard and felt, what her dumb, silent, deaf-fingers have brought into her heart of joy, hope and love. Think of that ye young eyes and ears that daily feast upon the beauty and melody of this outer world. Within the atmosphere of her quick sensibilities are felt the presence of those whose cup was full of affliction. She put her fingers, with her throbbing sympathies, upon the lean, bloodless faces of the famishing children of Ireland, and her sightless eyes filled with the tears that the blind may shed for griefs they cannot see. And she plied the needle with those fingers, and quickened their industry by placing them upon the slow, sickly pulse of want, that wasted her kind at noonday across the ocean.—Days and nights too—for days and nights were alike to her wakeful sympathies—and for weeks she wrought on with her needle. And then the embroidery of those fingers was sold to the merchants—would it had been sold to England's Queen, to be worn by the young princesses on days of state—it was sold and its purchase-price a barrel of flour instead of a country's harvest which it was well worth. And that barrel of flour was stowed away among the thousands that freighted the Jamestown on her recent mission of brotherly love to Ireland. That barrel of flour would that it might be to all the children of want in Ireland what the barrel of meal was to the household of her who entertained the prophet of old! Would, at least, that those whom it supplies with bread might know what fingers wrought for their sustenance!

Laura Bridgman and her barrel of flour should teach the world a lesson worth the woes of one year's famine. Let all the children of England and America learn that lesson by heart; and Ireland and the whole family of mankind will be the better for this visitation of want.—Church of England Magazine.

ASTRONOMICAL.—NAME OF THE PLANET (LAST) DISCOVERED, April 25, 1848. Extract of a letter dated Leipsic, 25th of May, from Dr. Jahn, editor of the "Wochentliche Unterhaltungen der Astronomie, Geographie, und Witterungskunde," to Lieut. Gilliss, U. S. N.:

"Should the astronomers of North America have under discussion a name and sign for the planet discovered at Markree Castle Observatory on the 25th of April by Mr. Graham, I take the liberty to request you will make known that I have already publicly proposed that its name shall be "Diana," and its symbol, a crescent transfixed with an arrow.

Neptune, Iris and Hebe, were also first proposed by me and adopted for the successively discovered planets."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Graham, printed in the "Monthly Notices" of the Royal Astronomical Society for May 12, 1848:

"Two names have been suggested to Mr. Cooper: "Thetis," with a wave for a symbol; and "Uretis," one of the oceanides, with an eye for the symbol. Metis (a prudent plan or counsel) is appropriate so far as the name is concerned, the discovery of the planet having resulted from a plan of observations devised by Mr. Cooper. He has directed me to choose, and I have selected the latter name, (Metis.) I trust, therefore, that astronomers will adopt this name, with an eye and star for symbol."

EDUCATION PROMOTIVE OF CIVIL LIBERTY.—To habituate our children from early life to rules of order, and to teach them justice, benevolence, sobriety, industry, truth and the fear of God, is no less necessary to perpetuate our liberties than to secure their personal enjoyment and respectability. This, indeed, goes into the correct idea of civilization, in distinction to barbarism. Whatever in the education and training of your children, goes to restrain and subdue bad passions, is so much gained on the score of civil liberty and social order.

"Kirwan" commences a series of letters in the New York Observer this week in reply to Bishop Hughes, who is writing against him in the Freeman's Journal. He proposes to follow him thro' all his arguments in vindication of the Roman Church. Sydney Smith, complaining of the proseiness of theological discussion, said it is usually conducted "as if sin was to be taken out of man like Eve out of Adam, putting him into deep slumber." This debate will at least avoid this mistake. It will scarcely put anybody to sleep, whatever else it may do.—Newark Adv.

THE CLINTON MONUMENT.—Messrs. MILLARD FILLMORE, LUTHER BRADISH and WILLIAM PARMELEE, a committee of the Trustees of the Clinton Monument Association, give notice that plans for the proposed Monument, accompanied with specifications of dimensions and materials, and estimates of expense, will be received by them until the 4th day of August next.

The Committee also inquire "where, and on what terms, suitable land can be obtained for the erection of the monument."

Communications giving such information in relation to the locality, along the central line of Internal Navigation and the shores of the Hudson, from Buffalo to New York, inclusive, are solicited. They may be sent to the Chairman at the city of New York.

The Rochester Democrat suggests that the summit of Mount Hope is the very best location for such a Monument. It is in full view for miles of the Erie Canal and Genesee Valley Canal, situated at their junction, 190 feet above their level, and about 500 feet above Lake Ontario. A Monument erected at this point would be visible for a great distance upon the Lake, and to a very large region of the surrounding country.

We are inclined to second the suggestion. Although we should be glad to have the monument of New York's immortal Son with us, yet we know of no place it would adorn so well, as the pinnacle of Mount Hope—no place so appropriate—so beautiful—so attractive, whereon to rest New York's memorial of gratitude to her great benefactor. Mount Hope is a wild, romantic spot—a fit resting place for the dead, where away amidst its shades and variegated scenery of hill and winding dale—its deep dells and swelling elevations, even the living find quietness, and its solitudes fill the soul with sublime emotions, as in their deep silence we hold communion with our own thoughts, with the sleeping dead around, and with God above.

The highest point of Mount Hope overlooks the surrounding country, for a long distance. It commands a view of a portion of the monument which has already been completed to CLINTON's memory, the Erie Canal—the City of Rochester, which has grown up on the fruit of this work. And we have no doubt but that the usual public spirit of our neighbors will be put forth in behalf of this State enterprize.—Commercial Advertiser.

FRONTIER POSTAL TROUBLES.—The Postmaster of Highgate, Vt., on the borders of Canada, advertises in the Montreal papers about two hundred letters which remain in consequence of the postage not being prepaid. The postage on each letter is stated, upon payment of which the letters will be forwarded.

"How is your wife to-day!" said a friend of ours to a French gentleman.

"Oh! moch de sem," said he; "she is no better; and I am 'fraid ver' little waas. If she is gon to die, I wish she would do it soon; I feel so unhapie; my mind is so much unset-tel. W'en she die, I shall not be so moche dissatisfied."

HAMILTON COLLEGE.—The Literary Anniversaries of this Institution will take place next week in the following order:

On Sunday evening, July 23d, an address will be delivered before the Society of Christian Research, by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher of Brooklyn.

On Monday evening, there will be Prize Declamations by members of the three lower classes.

On Tuesday afternoon (25th,) the Rev. Dr. Parker of Philadelphia, of the class of 1824, will deliver an oration before the Association of the Alumni, immediately after which the annual dinner of the Alumni will be discussed at the Clinton House. The memory of last year's meeting of the Alumni will no doubt attract great numbers of graduates to this celebration.

On Tuesday evening, the annual oration before the Literary Societies will be delivered by Dr. Thomas M. Foote, of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, and a Poem will be read by Wm H. C. Hosmer, Esq. of Avon.

On Wednesday (26th,) the usual Commencemencement Exercises will be held.

The class of 1838 will remember that 10 years have elapsed since they bade adieu to their Alma Mater.—Utica Gazette.

PROF. HENRY.—The Journal of Commerce relates the following:

We are reminded in this connection of an anecdote related to us by one of the most eminent counsellors in this State, while it illustrates our remarks pays a very just compliment to the learning of Prof. Henry. It is known to scientific men that the field of this gentleman's most extensive and important investigations and discoveries, has been Electricity. In the course of a trial of a cause in the city of Albany, said Judge ———, I was employed by the defence, and called on Prof. Henry, then in the Albany Academy, to give the court and jury some information in regard to the variations of the magnetic needle. I was surprised and interested at the clear, dignified and forcible character of his testimony, and the readiness with which he explained the most difficult points. So much was I interested, that I made my notes of his testimony very full and after the conclusion of the cause, I filed them away with the papers.

Many years later I was employed in a cause in Albany Co., which originated in the variation of the landmarks from those laid down in the old deeds. Six country surveyors had been employed to run the lines, and none could hit the old marks. We examined them all, day after day, and could reach no result. It occurred to me to open the testimony of Prof. Henry, which I had forgotten for years. I took it into Court with me, and selecting the most intelligent of the surveyors, I asked him a series of questions framed on that testimony. His replies were satisfactory. I then requested him to take a pencil, and giving him certain data from my notes, I requested him to calculate what his line would have been under such and such circumstances, variations, &c. He spent a long time in the calculations, but the result was to confirm the old deeds. All were astonished but myself.

A better illustration of the utility of many studies and discoveries which appear at first to be useless, could not be asked.

Western orators have said a great many smart things, but it was a homesick Irishman who said: "Sir, I was born at a very early period of life, and if ever I live till the day of my death, and the Lord only knows whether I will or not, my soul shall see sweat Ireland before it leaves Ameriky."

To the Bereaved.

INSCRIBED TO MRS. F. OF CHERRY VALLEY.

Though daily by examples shown,
The end of all beneath the sky,
Still, the fond heart is loath to own,
That these we love must also die.

And ne'er from tales of other's woe,
And never from the stranger's urn,
But only from bereavement's blow,
The depth of mourner's grief we learn.

Who, then, can tell, save those who feel,
A mother's anguish for the dead?
Would that my words had power to heal
A heart that hath so lately bled.

Bethink thee—may not He recall
In kindness, what His bounty lent?
For e'en our best beloved may fall
Beneath a shaft in mercy sent.

Sweet is the sleep of those who lie
Where mortal ills intrude no more;
And blessed are the dead that die,
Ere life's unclouded morn is o'er;

Ere sorrow bows, or guile assails
The heart yet buoyant, pure and young,
Or blighted love its woe bewails,
Or broken ties that heart hath wrung.

No broken ties, no bitter tears,
Await the child whose loss you mourn;
No thickening griefs of lengthen'd years—
That weary load which we have borne.

Why should we wish her doom'd to tread
The thorny path that we have trod?
Better, ere youth's bright dreams have fled,
"To sleep in Death, and be with God."

BUFFALO, July 26th.

Progress of Liberal Institutions in British North America.

From the Journal of Commerce.

The North American Review expresses its belief that the day is at hand for a final and complete separation from the mother country, of the British Continental possessions in North America. That the development of liberal principles in the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, has been astonishingly rapid, is evinced by the establishment in power of the party that represents them, and by the predominance of all the measures for which it contended previously to its assumption of office, as the law of the land. But the very comprehensiveness of the changes introduced into the system of colonial government, and the readiness, almost amounting to anticipation, with which concessions are made to colonial demands, have so effectually redressed all real grievances and left so few personal disabilities existing that there scarcely remains a basis for dissatisfaction or discontent. And in view of the vast substantial benefits which are constantly accruing to the Colonies, especially in the province of Canada, from British sagacity, enterprise and capital, there seems no motive for disruption, but every inducement of interest to strengthen the tie that secures to them a participation in the resources of the British Empire. Even the writer above referred to, somewhat inconsistently with his anticipations of Canadian independence, says, in allusion to the relinquishment by the British government of control over the commerce of the Colonies, to the impending abolition of the imperial custom houses and the withdrawal of revenue officers—it is fortunate for us that such concessions were not offered to the Whigs of our Revolution, or they and their descendants would have remained British subjects down to the present day.

But the appetite for freedom is only stimulated by the enjoyment of its sweets; and we should not be surprised, if, having secured what is termed responsible government—to wit, a ministry representing the predominant public feeling of the province—and, further, the exclusion of natives of England from holding any other office in the Colony than that of Governor—the men of Canada should ultimately insist on a practical recognition of their right to participate in all the employments of the British Empire, on the appointment of a Governor born in the Colony, and on a representation in the Imperial Parliament, as the alternative of their independence. Even now the most popular writers on political topics constantly present to public view the contrast between the rights and liberties enjoyed in the United States, and the restrictions imposed upon the Colonists—a practice which only a few years since, the public sentiment of the British provinces refused to tolerate.

A brief exposition of the course of public events in Canada, Nova Scotia ond New Brunswick, during the last three years, will serve to show the rapid development of liberal ideas. The attempt of Lord Elgin, on his arrival at Montreal last year, to conciliate the Liberals, by offering them an equal representation in a coalition ministry having failed, that party continued to offer a strenuous opposition in the Assembly, and renewed an agitation in the country which resulted in a complete triumph at the hustings early in 1848, the Liberals having returned a majority of thirty-four in a House of eighty-four members. The most prominent of these are men who, during Lord Durham's prefecture, were imprisoned, or banished, or declared traitors and outlaws, with a price set upon their heads, for participation in the rebellion of 1837; and some of this proscribed class occupy seats in the cabinet of the Governor General.—Yet the Assembly is conspicuous above all its predecessors for the talents, political experience and wealth of its members, and the country is prosperous under an enlightened rule.

At the close of Lord Falkland's unfortunate administration of the government of Nova Scotia, in the summer of 1846, Sir John Harvey was transferred from Newfoundland to that province; and much was anticipated from his moderation, coolness and sagacity—evinced while Governor of New Brunswick, in the negotiation respecting the Northeastern boundary of the United States, the satisfactory settlement of which he was greatly instrumental in producing—when the same qualities should be applied to reconciling and healing the differences and personal enmities that prevailed in Nova Scotia. He pursued the same course subsequently adopted by Lord Elgin in Canada, and with a like unsuccessful result. The Liberals refused to overcome their personal and political repugnances so far as to unite in council with the Conservatives, preferring an appeal to the country at a general election. Their course was approved by the Colonial Secretary at Home, who instructed the Governor to take no further steps towards a reconstruction of his cabinet, till a decision should be pronounced by the people at the hustings. The sense of the country was thus taken in the summer of 1847, and the Conservatives were signally defeated. Soon after the meeting of the new Assembly in January last, the Governor's Council resigned their offices, and the Liberals formed a ministry of their own leaders, and occupied all the great places of profit and trust. Thus for the first time was responsible government practically established in the province of Nova Scotia.

The first outbreak of discontent in New Brunswick occurred in December, 1844, in consequence of the appointment by Sir Wm. Colebrooke, the successor of Sir John Harvey, of his son-in-law Mr. Reade, to the office vacated by the death of the Provincial Secretary. A portion of the Governor's Council, disapproving of the appointment, not for want of ability on the part of the new incumbent, but for the sole disqualification of his being a native of Great Britain, and not a permanent resident of New Brunswick, resigned. Lord Stanley, the then Colonial Secretary, sanctioned the principle thus avowed, by instructing the Governor to give the Secretaryship to a Colonist, and to recall the members who had resigned their seats in the Council. And this decision is held to have established the principle in this particular, on which the colonial governments are to be administered. But the formal adoption of the system of responsible government in this province, was resolved on early in the present year, by a deliberate act of the Assembly after a discussion of two days. The proceedings excited a very general interest, and the resolution passed by a large majority. This plan of administration, therefore, is now in operation in each of the three Colonies.

Interior of Africa.

This is almost as yet a terra incognita. We know Europe pretty thoroughly. Asia has been traversed all its length by civilized travelers.—With the geography of America, we may call ourselves familiar. But how little do we know of the vast continent which lies wholly within the topics, and of which the greater part seems shut up as effectually against the advance of civilization as if it were upon another planet! Indeed the "Mountains of the Moon" would be subject to more accurate observation were they situated upon the satellite from which they derive their name.—The efforts of civilized travelers have been for centuries directed to the recess of this continent, yet four fifths of it is blank upon our maps. Its whole centre is one broad unexplored region, and the information obtained by recent travelers is of the most aggravating kind, showing us mines of wealth which it is impossible to work.

Before giving the result of these discoveries, let us look on Africa as described, and it may be familiar to most of our readers. Egypt, an old worn-out country, in its antiquities one of the most interesting places on the continent, occupies a small portion of its northeast border. The river Nile has been explored to its sources by Bruce and other travellers, who have given us some curious facts. The Barbary States occupy the northern portion bordering on the Mediterranean. South of this, and stretching from the Nile to the Atlantic, is the Great Desert of Sahara. Along the whole western coast are small establishments or factories for trade in slaves, gold dust, ivory, palm oil, and other vegetable productions. This trade has been nearly monopolized by the English until lately, but now American enterprise has taken a large portion of it out of their hands. On this coast are the settlements of Sierra Leone and Liberia, established as colonies of emancipated slaves, but both, we have reason to believe, are in a wretched condition. The English possessions are at the Cape of Good Hope. On the eastern shore there are a number of independent sovereignties, which carry on a limited trade.

Quite recently the English have made a settlement at Aden, near the mouth of the Red Sea.—Having once obtained a foothold, they, English like, began to push about them, and one of their first discoveries was a river where none was marked upon any chart, and upon this they steamed 300 miles without finding the least obstruction.—Having now passed round this continent, let us look up in the interior. For half a century the English government have been expending lives and treasure in a partial exploration. They have found that this whole tract of country is one of amazing fertility and beauty, abounding in gold and all sorts of tropical vegetation.

There are hundreds of woods, invaluable for dying and architectural purposes, not found in other portions of the world. Through it for thousands of miles sweeps a river, from three to six miles broad, with clear water, and of unsurpassed depth, flowing on at the rate of two or three miles an hour, without rock, shoal, or snag, to interrupt its navigation. Other rivers pour into this tributary waters of such volume as must have required hundreds of miles to be collected, yet they seem scarcely to enlarge it. This river pours its waters into the Atlantic, through the most magnificent delta in the world, consisting, perhaps, of a hundred mouths, extending probably 500 miles along the coast, and mostly broad, deep and navigable for steamboats. Upon this river are scattered cities, some of which are estimated to contain a million of inhabitants, and the whole country teems with a dense population.

Far in the interior, in the very heart of the continent, is a nation in an advanced state of civilization. The grandeur and beauty of portions of the country through which the Niger makes its sweeping circuit, are indescribable. In many places its banks rise boldly a thousand feet, thickly covered with the richest vegetation of tropical climes. But all this vast and sublime country—this scene of rich fertility and romantic beauty—is apparently shut out for ever from the world. It is the negro's sole possession. He need not fear the incursions of the white man there—for over this whole lovely country moves one dread malady, and to the white man it is the "valley of the shadow of death." In expedition after expedition, sent out from the English ports, on the island of Ascension, not one man in the ten has returned alive; all have fallen victims to this seemingly beautiful, but awful country. It seems impossible for an Englishman to breath that air. So dreadful is it—so small the chance of life, that criminals in England have been offered pardon on condition of volunteering in this service, more terrible than that of gathering the poison from the fabled Upas. This country, tempting as it is, can only be penetrated at the risk of life; and it is melancholy to think that those who have given us even the meagre information that we have, do so at the sacrifice of their lives.—Simmond's Colonial Magazine.

Dr. Channing on the Postoffice.—The following is extracted from the recently published life of William Ellery Channing:

We have not yet exhausted the question, how government may best strengthen and perpetuate our Union. There is one of its establishments which, in this point of view, we highly value, and which we fear is not sufficiently prized for the benefit it confers. We refer to the Postoffice. The facilities which this institution affords to the government for communication with all parts of the country, are probably regarded by many as the most important national service which it renders. But it does incomparably more for us as a community. It does much towards making us one, by admitting free communication between distant parts of the country, which no other channel of intercourse could bring together. It binds the whole country in a chain of sympathies, and makes it in truth one great neighborhood. It promotes a kind of society, between the seashore and the mountains. It perpetuates friends between those who are never to meet again. It binds the family in the new settlement and the half-cleared forest to the cultivated spot from which it emigrated. It facilitates, beyond calculation, commercial connexions, and the interchange of products. On this account, we always grieve to see a statement of the revenue accruing to government from the Postoffice.

It ought not to yield a cent to the treasury. It should simply support itself. Such importance do we attach to the freest communication between all parts of the country, so much do we desire that the poor, as well as rich, may enjoy the means of intercourse, that we would sooner have the Postoffice a tax on the revenue, than one of its resources.

The Departments of France.

From the Journal of Commerce.

Respect for property, ambition to acquire a corn-field or a vineyard, to extend its limits and to transmit it by inheritance, are the moving influences that control the population of the French provinces. The minute subdivision of territory, the practical equality of condition among its numerous proprietors, the personal interest at stake in the security of property and in the common prosperity, peculiarly qualify the peasantry of France for republican institutions. Hence it is no matter of surprise, that on the successful accomplishment of the Revolution of February, the Departments received with joy the proclamation of a Republic, in the confidence that institutions framed to secure an equality of rights, would bring relief from existing burdensome charges and painful restraints. Under the King, France had been oppressed with taxation. The Provisional Government that succeeded, promised a frugal expenditure, now that the people were no longer burdened with the costly splendor of a monarchy. No doubt these assurances were made in good faith; for till experience of the operation of the ateliers nationaux, no one could have foreseen what boundless treasures would be absorbed in the support of that unruly population, whose temporary maintenance was a condition of the government's existence. It gave the government being, and during the infancy of its progeny it had the power as well as the will to visit disobedience with death. Of the needy population of Paris, part were provided for in the national workshops, the rest were attached to the standing army under the name of gardes mobiles. The establishment of the ateliers nationaux was the first step towards the practical development of communism, which was professed by at least one of the members of the Provisional Government, and was contended for by all the needy whose wants it promised to supply. But beyond the limits of Paris, with a partial exception perhaps in some of the larger cities and towns, where a like miserable population is influenced by the same predial instincts, the doctrine was regarded with horror. The declaration that the possession of landed property by individuals is a spoliation of the republic, was a direct attack on the self-interest of the French peasant.

The inndustrians propagation of this theory by emissaries from the capital, alarmed him for the security of his property. He had already felt the influence of its practical recognition at Paris, in decrees of the government, first demanding the payment in advance of a portion of the tax for the ensuing year, and then imposing an additioual tax of 45 per cent. rendered necessary by the odious experiment of providing for the unemployed. The urgency of the crisis, and the conviction that the burden was only temporary, produced a reluctant and partial assent to these demands for resources from a country already drained. The elections were at hand, and the period was approaching when the direction of affairs would be confided to the representatives of the whole country; and the result justified the confidence felt in the soundness of public sentiment. The country had accepted a republic, but a republic of peace and order, based upon moderate principles; and, in spite of the most indefatigable efforts on the part of an active minority of the Provisional Government and of the clubs of Paris, to disseminate the principles of ultrarepublicanism, a National Assembly elected by universal suffrage on its broadest basis contained an overwhelming majority of men of moderate principles—the determined opponents of the violent and reckless republicans who so largely controlled the destinies of the nation. The consequence was, a series of measures tending to the repression of socialism and to the security of property. The communists and ultras resolved on a desperate effort to establish their supremacy; a conspiracy of the violent, discontented and needy broke out in Paris on the 15th of May, and for a few hours the government was overthrown, and the fate of the nation was suspended in a balance. The conspirators seized the telegraph, and in lying despatches to the provinces announced the success of the anarchists and their establishment in power. So great was the alarm excited in the departments, that before they could be made aware of the true state of the case, the National Guards from the remotest parts of France, were on their way to the capital, to re-establish the sovereignty of the Assembly.

The Assembly having secured its rightful escendancy, determined on the gradual abolition of the ateliers nationaux. A considerable proportion of them were strangers to Paris; and there it was proposed to disperse throughout France, in the districts to which they severally belonged. To those who remained, work was to be offered, for which they were to be paid, not by the day as heretofore, but by the piece, and at its market value. Nor were these to be permitted to dictate as heretofore, the species of labor in which they were to be engaged. Labor is the source of wealth only when appropriately and opportunely applied; and the representatives of the people properly determined to designate the employment of those who were to derive from the people the remuneration for their labor. Up to this time the workmen had been supported in idleness, and now they refused to accept the alternative of labor or starvation offered them by the Government. They resolved on revolution, and, combined with monarchists and men degraded by criminal conduct, they waged an unavailing war against the Government. For four days and nights the streets of Paris ran with blood. Many were the willing victims—martyrs of good order,—and finally the victory declared itself in favor of that holy cause. There was no time when the result was doubtful. Even if the anarchists had succeeded in achieving any considerable success, their triumph could have been but temporary. The whole of France was pouring in to the rescue of the government. A friend of ours who went from London to Paris with the knowledge that the difficulties were commencing and that some conflicts had taken place, writes: "At Boulogne the news seemed more decisive. A call had been made upon the Garde National there and at Calais. Many were answering to it, some with alacrity, some reluctantly: heads of families were leaving with small prospects of ever returning. The young and old who were left behind, all were anxious—not a few agonized. I saw what I had never before seen in France, the external expression of inquietude by the rigid muscles on the brow."

The same writer says: "The Republic is now safe. The result of the four days is decisive.—There may be more difficulties, but they will be overcome. The Constitution will be calmly considered: minor differences will be yielded, and the desire will be to establish a form of government assimilated to the progressive capacity and genius of man."

Close of the Volume.

With this number closes the Tenth Volume of the Messenger, and the seventh year of its existence. The first four years it was printed in the quarto form and made one volume a year; the last three years it has been printed in the octavo form and has made two volumes a year. This explanation is intended for our later subscribers, who might not understand how there could be ten volumes in seven years.

The question has often been asked us, "When is Buffalo to have a monthly magazine?" We are now prepared to answer the question. By reference to the Prospectus on the last page, it will be seen that the Messenger is to be changed into such a periodical. The conclusion to make this alteration has not been arrived at hastily: for five years we have been looking forward to the period when Buffalo would demand such a work. And in our humble opinion—and in the opinion of older and wiser ones—the time has fully come.

Thus changed, our patrons will find the Messenger handier to read and easier to preserve. At the same time, as stated in the Prospectus, they will not find its character materially altered. It will contain, as heretofore, less fiction than solid reading; and what of the former is admitted, will be replete with healthy sentiment. In short the aim will be to publish nothing that is not worth preserving and re-perusing in future years. The news department will embrace multum in parvo, and be as valuable as any other portion of the work. The local department will contain every thing truly worthy of note that transpires, from month to month, in our thriving and noble city.

Let our readers be patient, and in four weeks they shall have a magazine which will delight their vision to scrutinize—fair to look upon, clean in proof, and pleasant and edifying to read.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.—Our thanks are due to the Hon. ANDREW STEWART of Pa. for congressional documents.

MR. J. E. ANNIN, late agent for the Messenger at Ann Arbor, Mich., and now residing at Detroit, will do well to make returns to us without delay.

DEATH OF JUDGE WILKESON.—We are grieved to record the death of SAMUEL WILKESON of this city, who died at Kingston, Roane Co., Tenn., on the 7th instant. The cause of his death was the bronchial erysipelas, a disease with which he had been afflicted for two years. At the time of his death he was on his way to visit a daughter, Mrs. Johnson, residing at Telaco Plains. He was within forty miles of the place, accompanied by another daughter, when death overtook him.

JUDGE WILKESON was one of the early settlers in this place, and witnessed the growth of Buffalo from a little village to a great city. In 1836 he was elected Mayor of the city. Strong in mind, energetic in spirit, and warm in heart, he has been for years one of our most active, efficient and useful citizens, and not only his relatives and the church of Christ, but the whole city, will lament his loss. His age was sixty-seven.

THE LITERARY WORLD, of which we have before had occasion to speak, is the most valuable work for publishers, booksellers and editors in the country. It is published by Osgood & Co. New-York, at $3 per annum.

SUBSCRIBERS wishing for back numbers of volumes nine and ten to complete their files, can be supplied with most of them, by addressing us a line post paid. Can any of them send us number eight of this volume?

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Communications from H. W. Rockwell, Esq., "Florine" and others, are filed for insertion in the first number of the next volume.

THE HOME OF SHAKSPEARE, a beautifully illustrated little volume, has lately been published by WILLIAM BROTHERS, New-York, and is for sale at Peck's bookstore.

SLAVE CASE AT DETROIT.—The Detroit Daily Advertiser of the 13th says that the jury in the case of Giltner vs. Charles Gorham and others, had not been able to agree, and were discharged. This was the celebrated trial brought up by some Kentuckians for indemnity for ten slaves whom the defendants had assisted to escape to Canada.

ARRIVALS AT SARATOGA.—Within the week ending the 14th inst., there were 883 arrivals at Saratoga.

THE FIRST PIG OF COPPER.—We were yesterday shown the first pig of copper manufactured in this State. It was smelted in Birmingham from ore brought from the Sault, and was of a rich appearance. How long will it be before we shall begin to announce the shipment from this State of cargoes of "the same sort."—Detroit Free Press.

The revolution in France assumed a more promising aspect, the late insurrection having been completely quelled and tranquility restored. Gen. Cavaignac is the almost irresponsible Dictator of France. He seems to be zealously occupied in consolidating the government. The funds are rapidly improving and for the first time since the overthrow of monarchy, the hope is raised that France will secure for herself, after all her bloodsheds and sacrifices, an effective, just and moderate Executive.

Lamartine and Ledru Rollin are constantly watched. It is generally believed that Caussidiere was at the head of the late insurrection.

AGRICULTURAL ROOMS, July 18.

"The grounds of that essay (on the Potato Disease) are now receiving unfortunate confirmation, in the gradual approach of the Potato Disease once more. Its first manifestations were seen on Friday last, (14th July,) since which time its progress has not been rapid. Unless the very unfavorable weather of the last two days should give it fresh impulse, I hope it will pass off without affecting the tubers."

THE LATE JUDGE WILKESON.—The gentleman who furnished us with the information in regard to Judge Wilkeson's death, yesterday morning, adds:

"He died on the banks of Tennessee River, in Cumberland mountains, the land of hospitality, where the name stranger is held a passport to every kindness. Many are the weeks that I have traversed those mountains, and I found an open door and a welcome home at every dwelling.—This is a land of plenty and of hospitality—a stranger's home. My correspondent, a distinguished citizen of Tennessee, for 40 years a neighbor of Andrew Jackson, was travelling across the mountains, tarried to follow the stranger to a stranger's grave, and wrote me immediately on his return to his lodgings, after performing the last act of duty and kindness."—Jour. of Com.

Mitchell, the Irish Agitator.

It will be seen by the following, says the Journal of Commerce, that the story of MITCHELL'S being harshly treated at Bermuda is entirely without foundation. It is an extract from a private letter, and dated—

ST. GEORGE, Bermuda, July 7th.

Mitchell is said to be in very ill health, and is not permitted by the Governor to be put on the public works, but has private cabins allotted to him on board the Medway. He is allowed his own servant, and I hear, treated in every respect like a gentleman.—T—— says he is a gentleman convict.

The following particulars of the voyage of the exile, and his arrival at Bermuda, were received by the Great Western at New Orleans. We copy from the Picayune:

The man-of-war steamer Scourge having received an admiralty order to that effect, proceeded to Spike Island, in the Cove of Cork, and after taking on board John Mitchell, sailed on the first of June for the Island of Bermuda, where she relieved the Daring, Capt. Peel, which has been for a long time on that station. The Scourge arrived at Bermuda, on the 20th of June, and our informant saw Mitchell on the 22d. Mitchell had been treated during the passage in every respect as a gentleman, dined with the captain of the ship, and was treated as a guest, by the express order of the Admiralty Board. He had the entire range of the quarter-deck during the passage, but a sergeant of marines always accompanied him. The day after he arrived he was sent on shore, and soon afterwards conveyed on board the convict hulk Medway, which lies near Ireland Island, in the harbor of Bermuda. Mitchell was not dressed as a convict, but wore the usual apparel of a gentleman. He appeared sad and low spirited, and looked pale and haggard. It was the impression among the officers at Bermuda, that a private room would be fitted for him on board the hulk, and that he would not have to labor.

A STRANGE BIRD.—The Philadelphia North American contains the following notice of a strange bird recently captured, and brought to that port:

AT SEA, July 14, 1848.

A beautiful, large bird, and graceful in its movements, of the Pelican species, was seen hovering around the schooner Telegraph, Captain Tooker, four days out from New York, in lat. 39 deg. 25 min., lon. 75 deg. 7 min. West, on the afternoon of this day. It was observed by those on board, from its motions, to be greatly fatigued, from being long on the wing, and showed a manifest disposition to alight on some part of the rigging.—On eyeing it closely with the glass, a label, suspended by a string, was seen appended to its neck, which the bird was vainly endeavoring to remove.

After hovering perhaps for half an hour or more, it settled upon the main-mast head, where it was captured, (after making a considerable show of resistance, and picking viciously at him) by Mr. Dickinson, the 1st officer, who at no little personal risk and danger to himself, succeeded in bringing it to the deck.

On examining the label, which was of leather, and shaped in the form of a heart, the following was observen written upon it:

"W. W. BRYON, 2d Master, ship Delia Walker, July 12, 1848."

This bird, as before observed, is of the pelican race, very beautiful in its plumage and symmetry, its color a dark brown; the feathers around its neck formed in a ring of a deeper shade of that color; the under part of the wings of a snow white; bill long and thick; measures five feet and upward across the wings, and largely web-footed. It has thus far steadily refused all offers of water or food of any kind; it attacks violently any one who attempts to approach it.

Chain and Anchor Camels.—Some very interesting experiments were made on Thursday last, at the Navy Yard, in testing this new invention of Capt. G. W. Taylor.

It is a contrivance for floating out anchors and chains, by the use of air-bags made of india-rubber, instead of carrying them in boats, as is the present practice, to the imminent danger of the lives of the boats' crews. The chain, as it passes the hawser-hole, is attached to air-bags of cylindrical form, 12 inches in diameter, and 20 feet long, which are connected together by brass coupling screws. The size used for the experiments, was calculated for a sloop-of-war's chain, but was found fully adequate to float the chain of a frigate, and when fully distended with air, even the cable of a ship-of-the-line. It showed about one-quarter of its bulk above water, and looking, a short distance off, like a sea-serpent, as the waves gave it an undulating motion.

The anchor is suspended in a similar manner, by a bag of larger dimensions, and globular form, which is also to be connected with those which sustain the chain. After the anchor and the desirable length of cable is thus floated, they are towed off in the direction in which they are wanted to lay, and at a given signal the air is exhausted from all the bags at once, and the anchor and chain of course go to the bottom, with the bags attached, (having sufficient air retained to float them clear of the bottom) and they can be raised again by inflating the camels. Forty-five fathom of cable were floated in the manner described—the spectators being fully satisfied of the practicability of the plan, the experiment was discontinued. In the afternoon, experiments were continued by floating an anchor weighing upwards of 9,000 pounds, which it was ascertained could be towed against wind and tide by a four-oared boat.

This method of managing chains and anchors, it is supposed, will be of great advantage, when a vessel is on a lee shore, and it is necessary to carry them to windward, in a heavy sea, as it is very dangerous, if not impossible, in such cases, to carry them out in boats.

It is estimated that 30 sections of the chain camel (100 fathom) will be sufficient for any ship, and can be stowed away in 260 gallon casks; and that with a proper apparatus in a case of emergency, they could be inflated in half an hour.—The experiments were witnessed by Commodores Downes and Parker, and many other naval officers and nautical men, and were considered as quite satisfactory.

These air-bags or camels can be usefully employed in many other cases. They can be formed into a raft sufficiently buoyant to support and save a whole ship's company. They can be attached to the sides of boats when sent on dangerous service, and thereby render them perfect life-boats. Some of these bags are encompassed by wooden hoops, so that they will inflate themselves upon being stretched out, which can be done in a moment's time. Recently two officers of the U. S. belonging to the Iris and Vixen, of the Gulf Squadron, Lieutenants Harris and Pinckney, were lost in the surf on the bar of one of the Mexican ports, when if they had been furnished with these contrivances, they might have avoided the fatal catastrophe, as it need not be five minutes' wore to inflate and attach them to the sides of the boats. These camels can also be used to float cannon and other heavy articles ashore, and also to obtain water from shore, in certain cases of difficulty, and probably for many other useful purposes.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

A New "Voice in the Wilderness."—On Sabbath last, for the first time in Madison, the hour of church service was announced by the ringing of a bell! This much needed article, after great delay, finally reached town on Friday noon, and was speedily elevated to its place in the First Congregational Church. The bell is a splendid one, of fine tone, weighing 760 pounds, and with the accompanying frame, &c., 1300 pounds, and is from the foundry of Andrew Meneeley, West Troy, N. Y.—Madison, (Wis.) Argus.

Good Sense is as different from Genius as perception is from invention; yet, though distinct qualities, they frequently exist together. It is altogether opposite to wit, but by no means inconsistent with it. It is not science, for there is such a thing as unlettered good sense; yet, though it is neither wit, learning, nor genius, it is a substitute for each where they do not exist, and the perfection of all where they do.—Hannah Moore.

Barberous——Mustachios.—The Adjutant General of the Army of the U. States, has published a General Order, prohibiting the Officers, except of the Cavalry, from disfiguring their faces with mustachios, imperials, or whiskers descending below the ear! This is well. The Dandy officers have become too "hideous" to be longer tolerated in this "costume de la barbe."

Death of Hon. Wm. L. Brent.—A letter from New Orleans, dated the 8th instant, states that the Hon. Wm. L. Brent (formerly a member of Congress from Lousiana) died suddenly at St: Martinsville, La., of apoplexy. He had just got into his carriage when he was taken, and died immediately. Subsequent to his retiring from Congress, Mr. Brent, for many years, was a prominent member of the bar in Washington city; and under his auspices there his son, Robert J Brent, Esq., of the Baltimore bar, embraced the profession. Mr. Brent's late residence in Louisiana has been for about five years.

Mr. Hale and the Buffalo Convenlion,—Many inquiries have been made respecting the views of Mr. Hale in relation to the Buffalo Convention. We are authorized to state that, personally, he would be pleased to see such a state of things as would justify him in the opinion of his friends in withdrawing his name from the canvass, but he will not do so without the concurrence of his friends in the measure. He is anxious that Liberty men should attend the Buffalo meeting, if their judgment dictate such a step, and aid, by their counsel and presence, to such a course as shall unite on a proper basis all the opponents of Slavery and Slavery Extension.—National Era.

We have a report that the blacks, on the Island of St. Croix, have revolutionized and been successful in overthrowing the government at that Island. Upon the receipt of this information at St. Thomas on the 4th of July, the Governor declared the blacks all free, thereby preventing an outbreak. He despatched a steamer from St. Johns to quell any attempt at insurrection.

NONSUITING A CREDITOR.—There was a certain lawyer on the Cape a long time ago, the only one in those "diggins," then, and for aught I know, at present. He was a man well to do in the world and what was somewhat surprising in the limb of the law, averse to encouraging litigation.

One day a client came to him in a violent rage. "Look-a here, Squire," said he, "that 'ere blasted shoemaker down to Pigeon Cove has gone and sued me for the money for a pair of boots I owed him." "Did the boots suit you?" "Oh! yes—I've got 'em on—fust rate boots." "Fair price?" "Oh! yes." "Then you owe him the money honestly." "'Course." "Well, why don't you pay him?" "Why, 'cause the blasted snob went and sued me, and I want to keep him out of the money if I kin." It will cost you something." "I don't keer a cuss for that. How much money do you want to begin with?" "Oh, ten dollars will do." "Is that all. Well here's an X, so go ahead," and the client went away very well satisfied with the beginning.

Our lawyer next called on the shoemaker and asked him what he meant by commencing legal proceedings against M———, "Why," said he "I kept on sendin' to him for money till I got tired. I knowed he was able to pay—and I was 'termined to make him. That's the long and short of it." "Well," said the lawyer—"he has been a good customer to you, and I think you acted too hastily. There's a trifle to pay on account of your proceedings—but I think you had better take this five dollars, and call it all square." "Certain—Squire—if you say so—and glad to get it," was the answer. So the lawyer gave one V and kept the other. In a few days the client came along asked him how he got on with the case. "Rapidly!" cried the lawyer, "we've non suited him! he'll never trouble you." "Jerusalem! that's great!"

PROSPECTUS

OF THE

Western Literary Messenger.

VOLUME ELEVEN.

The time has come when Buffalo, with a population of forty-five thousand inhabitants, is able to support a MONTHLY MAGAZINE; consequently, on the first of September, the Messenger will be merged into such a periodical, and be issued promptly on the first of each month.—It will be printed on new type and beautiful white paper, the pages to remain the present size, and their number to be the same as the Columbian Magazine and the three dollar periodicals generally. The pages, however, will be set in solid matter, and thus afford, at least one fifth more reading on an equal space, than is ordinarily found in magazines, making the Messenger, with the terms unaltered, the cheapest monthly magazine of which we have any knowledge.

The features of the publication will not be materially altered, except that the monthly summary of news, foreign, domestic and local, will all be carefully sifted by the editor, re-written and condensed; and such incidents mainly, will be recorded, as will be embraced in the future history of our city, the country and the world. The literary department will be composed of the choicest selected miscellany and original articles on the greatest variety of subjects—such as will tend to instruct as well as amuse.—The publication of the lectures before the Young Men's Association, we are happy to say, will be continued, probably one a month. These are the most useful reading we can give, and the fact that our country subscribers are pleased with them, speaks well for their taste and mental cultivation.

Mr. J. CLEMENT, to whose energy and ability the Messenger owes, in a great measure, its wide circulation and high reputation, will remain the Editor.

Will our present subscribers, and all persons friendly to the work, aid in extending its circulation. Old subscribers who have had it in clubs heretofore, can receive it another year at the same rate, allowing the money in forwarded strictly in advance.
